A gentleman in West Philadelphia had a large lemon-tree, which he prized highly. He placed it in his hall nea the vestibule door, the side-lights o which were of glass of different colors blue and violet predominating. The sunlight passing through these side lights fell upon a portion of the branches of the lemon-tree, and great vigor was imparted to the vitality of these branches, which were filled with fine fruit, while other branches which did not receive the light from the blue and violet panes were small and without fruit.

The early vegetables used in the General's family are for the most part started in pots under blue and plain glass, then transplanted into proper soil, and are ready for use several weeks in advance of the market. Thus he has used corn as early as July 12, which does not ordinarily mature until Aug. 10.

During the latter part of 1871, Commodore Goldsborough learned of Gen. Pleasonton's experiments and proceeded to imitate them at Mound City, Ill., where he was then stationed.

The first trial was made by the surgeon, who had every alternate pane of uncolored glass removed from each of two windows in his parlor, and substituted for them corresponding panes of blue glass. A number of plants and vines of many varieties, potted, were properly placed in the room, and in a short time began to manifest the effects of the remarkable influence to which they had been subjected. Their growth was rapid, and they increased in the length of their branches from one inch and a half to three inches, according to their species, every twenty-four hours.

The second experiment was made on the development of the newly-hatched chickens of two broods of the same variety hatched on the same day. One of the coops was partly covered with blue and plain glass; the other coop was a common one. The chickens were fed at the same time, with equal quantities of the same feed. Those under the blue glass soon began to display the effects of the stimulating influence of the blue and sun light by their daily almost visible growth and increase of activity, far exceeding the development of the chickens of the other brood.

Early in 1872 the wife of one of the gentlemen on the station gave birth prematurely to a child weighing only three and a half pounds. It was very feeble, possessing but little vitality. The windows of the room in which it was born and reared were draped with blue curtains, through which and the plain glass windows the sunlight entered the room. The lacteal system of the mother was greatly excited and secreted an excessive quantity of milk, while at the same time the child's appetite was increased to such an extent that the mother sometimes found it difficult to satisfy its hunger. The child grew rapidly, and four months after its birth weighed twenty-two pounds, being at the rate of four and five-eighths pounds per month.

Gen. Pleasonton proceeds to relate the following extraordinary circumstances: At the close of the late civil war he bought a couple of mules which had been in the military service. One of them was completely deaf, his hearing having been destroyed by the noise of heavy firing. Two or three years after the General got him the animal was seized with so violent acute rheumatism that he could not walk. He got a great deal better of it, but his deafness continued until the spring of 1874, when he recovered entirely from both deafness and rheumatism. Over each of the doors of the stable to which he had been moved was a transom with panes of blue and colorless glass. The stall of this mule was before a door with such a transom over it, and the rising sun cast his light through the transom on to the neck and back of the head of this mule. In the afternoon he threw his light again upon the head and neck of this mule through the transom of a side door. The effect of the light upon the animal was the cure of his rheumatism and the removal of his deafness; and he is now as healthy and hearty a mule as can be seen anywhere. The removal of the deafness was produced by an electro-magnetic current evolved by the two lights upon his auditory nerves and exciting them to healthy action.

THERE are only about fifty Chinamen at Beaver Falls, Pa., now. These are all engaged in the cutlery works. The others who were there completed their labor contracts, and have gone elsewhere in search of employment.

Singular Instances of Moral Sense in a Horse.

[From the Atlantic Monthly.]

I have a horse who is now not less than 41 years old, and it is possible that he is a year or two older; for thirty-eight years ago he was broken to use. He is at present on the retired list, only occasionally being called upon to lend a helping shoulder to his younger colleague; but his intellect is as fresh and as full of expedients as ever. No horse ever knew better how to save himself, to spare effort and prolong his powers; no one was ever so cunning to slip his halter, open the feed-box and supply the phosphates, the necessity of which to him he knew as well as any "scientist." I have seen him, through a crack in a board shanty, used while the stable was building, lift and lay aside with his teeth six boxes which were piled atop of one another, until he found the oats at the bottom. Then, when my head appeared at the window, he instantly gave up his leisurely, luxurious munching of the grain, opened his jaws to their fullest extent, thrust his muzzle deep into the box, and gravely walked back to his stall with at least a quart of oats in his mouth. This horse had a playful habit of snapping at my arm when he was harnessed for a drive. (I always talk to a horse before starting, as a matter of common politeness.) Of course I never flinched, and his teeth often grazed my sleeve as he struck them together. One day, more than a dozen years ago, he was in rather reckless spirits, and snapped a little too vigorously, catching my arm actually in his jaws. I scarcely felt the bite, but I was very much surprised. The horse, however, showed such unmistakable signs of regret and distress that I simply said, "Never do that again!" And he never did! From that moment he gave up the habit of years; he laid back his ears or feigned anger in other ways, but he never again made believe to bite. This, certainly, goes far beyond the temporary sorrow for an unintentional injury which may be referred to an animal's affection. What else is conscience than knowledge of wrong made permanent by a memory which forbids the repetition of the wrong? The same horse once revealed to me the latter quality in a surprising way. On telling the story privately, I find that it is sometimes incredulously received; yet I am sure that no one who cherishes the proper respect for animals will refuse it credence. In the company of a friend I was driving along a country road in a light, open buggy. I paid no attention to the horse, for he could turn, back, or execute any other maneuver in harness as well without as with a driver. Halting at a house where my friend wished to call, I waited for him outside. Presently the horse looked back at me, twisting his body between the thills in a singular fashion. I perceived that he had some communication to make, and said, "What is the matter now, Ben?" Thereupon, by twisting a little more, he managed to hold up his right hind foot, and I saw that the shoe had been lost. "That's right," said I; "you shall have a new shoe as soon as we get to the village." He set down his foot, and for a moment seemed satisfied. Then the same turning of the head and twisting of the body were repeated. "What, Ben! is anything else the matter?" I asked. He now lifted up the left hind foot, which was still shod. I was quite at a loss to understand him, and remained silent. He looked back at me out of the corner of his eye, and evidently saw that I was puzzled, whereupon he sat down his foot and seemed to think. Almost immediately he lifted it up and shook it vigorously. The loose shoe rattled. There was a positive process of reasoning in this act, and it is too simple and clear to be interpreted in any other way.

The Boy and the Panther.

The Colusa (Cal.) Sun tells the following story: "Last Saturday Master John Williams, aged 13, was out hunting near home, on Elk creek, when he ran across a panther and gave him the benefit of the contents of his rifle. The panther made off, and the young man loaded up again and gave him chase, getting in another shot on him. This time, however, the panther got out of his sight, but he could see from the blood that he had been hit. He went home and dreamed all night, of course, of fighting panthers with a grizzly or two thrown in to make it interesting. Next morning, bright and early, he gathered his gun, determined on finding that panther. He got on the blood, which he traced into a hollow log. He fired into the log, and then got an ax and cut the panther out, finding him still alive, but he finished him up and dragged his trophy in triumph home. An inspection showed that both balls of the previous evening had gone through the panther's lungs. He was an immense fellow, measuring seven feet from tip to tip."

Doctors Disagree.

Chicago is suffering severely from scarlet fever and diphtheria. At a meeting of physicians to consider the epidemic and its proper treatment a resolution was offered, the purport of which was that no medicines which could be administered would prevent diphtheria, and that the continued administration of them for any great length of time would be injurious. Dr. Beebee declares that this was aimed at his recommendation of sulpho-carbolate of soda, which, he holds, will destroy the germs of diphtheria, the blood and tissues being disinfected. He thinks that the remedy has fulfilled all expectations; and some of his brethren, it appears, think otherwise. Who shall decide when even Chicago doctors disagree?

The Plague of Mothers-in-Law.

The Coroner of Chicago, in an annual report, says that of fifty-five suicides in that city within a year only four were victims of love. He alludes to one of these as a man who "blew out what little brains he had on account of the tortures to which he was subjected by his mother-in-law." The Coroner also says: "Mothers-in-law have always been a great power of mischief to the world, and, alas, the plague is so universal and enduring that we must despair of ever seeing it overcome. The miseries caused by mothers-in-law are eternal, even as mothers-in-law themselves are immortal."

RUSSIA INVADED.

Not by the Turks, but Peaceably by American Manufacturers.

[From the New York Tribune.]

It will be a long time yet before the Americans know all that is to be known about the curious eyes which studied them and their institutions and arts during the months of the Philadelphia Exhibition, or before they realize in full how much impressed foreigners were by what they saw. Whatever were the thoughts which Europeans took home with them in regard to the taste and skill of the Americans in the elegant arts, there is already plenty of proof that they went off with genuine respect for our mechanical abilities, which in some cases amounted to admiration, and which has given our countrymen a better standing in the markets of the world and is creating an unexpected demand for American productions. New instances come to light every day. The latest comes from Russia, and is a very pleasing one.

It seems that the agricultural provinces of Russia, those lying in the south and west of the empire, have begun to suffer from competition with the United States in the sale of grain. Not only is the exportation of Russian cereals to Europe restricted by the shipment from the American States of enormous quantities of the same class of products, but the Russian commercial houses and landholders have been compelled to accept cheaper prices for what they do export. The competition with the United States is growing more severe every year, and the intelligent men of the south and west of Russia have come to feel about as the British manufacturers do in the field of industry, that something must be done or they will be able no longer to stand up against the new world in the business in which their capital is principally invested. They have accordingly made a study of the American system of agriculture within the past two years, through two agents, for the purpose of discovering the secret of American success and making use of it in Russia.

The gentlemen who have been acting for them are Mr. Benedict Kolyszko, a prominent and wide-awake land-holder of South Russia, and Mr. T. F. Krajewski of this city, a young engineer of education, who, during five years' residence in this country, part of the time having been spent in the employ of Grant Locomotive Works, at Paterson, N. J., has become favorably known for good judgment and ability. Commissioned by the boards of agriculture to act for them, these gentlemen spent several months the past summer at the Philadelphia Exhibition and in studying the methods of agriculture in the Western States. The cause of American success in grain-raising is no trade secret, and the Russian agents discovered it immediately. It consists, not in the fertility of the soil, but in intelligent work and an abundance of excellent implements and labor-saving machinery. Mr. Kolyszko and Mr. Krajewski were not long in coming to the conclusion that, in order to maintain a competition with the United States in agriculture, the Russians must put into the hands of their laborers the superior farming implements and labor-saving machinery of the Americans.

Mr. Kolyszko has returned to Russia, and three trials have been made in the presence of interested crowds of spectators. One was at Odessa, where a competition took place between English and American plows and implements, and where the latter won a signal success. Another was on the lands of Count Malachowski, a large landholder. This was a private trial. It was attended by several hundred landholders, and resulted in deepening the good opinion beginning to be felt toward American implements. The third was an official trial, under the supervision of the Board of Agriculture, at Cherson. It was on this occasion that certain things were decided as to the size and form of certain implements best adapted to Russian use. As a result of these trials, the Boards of Agriculture of South and West Russia have decided to recommend the general use of American implements, and they have so done, and Mr. Kolyszko has been designated as their agent for importing them. Mr. Krajewski, at No. 73 Broadway, is the engineer, inspector and agent in this country.

In pursuance of the plan which has been detailed, orders were given for tools and implements, one of them being to a firm in Louisville, Ky., for 10,000 plows. A mowing machine adapted to Russian soil has been picked out, and experiments are in progress in New England to ascertain the best kind of portable engine for Russian employment. For the purchase of specimens of this latter class of heavy machinery, for trial and exhibition in various parts of Russia, $5,000 has been appropriated to the Board of Agriculture. The orders which have been given, and the experiments which are making, are only the beginning of what Mr. Krajewski believes, and what may possibly prove to be, a considerable trade in implements with Russia.

Sale of a Menagerie.

The great London menagerie was recently disposed of at auction, at Atlanta, Ga. The following are some of the prices paid for wild beasts: Four royal Bengal tigers, $4,000; five elephants, $15,000; six hyenas, $1,000; an eland and two peccaries, with the cage, $1,000; a large African lion, $400; a lioness and three cubs, $400; five panthers, $900; a sacred cow, $300; a camel, $300; a zebra, $500; eight small ponies and their Cinderella carriage, $1,100; four Shetland ponies were sold at the very low figure of $35 each. The total amount realized by the sale was $52,680.50.

IT is now generally admitted by honest physicians that, when once the consumption is fairly fastened upon the lungs, no human power can save the patient from death. They also say that about 50 per cent. of those who die from this disease can trace the cause to a neglected cough or cold, which might have been cured by a small bottle of Liquid Opodeldoc, or, what is the same thing, Johnson's Anodyne Liniment.

The Gospel of Merit.

Where there is so much rivalry as in the manufacture of family medicines, he who would succeed must give positive and convincing proof of merit. This is an age of inquiry. People take nothing for granted. They must know the "whys" and "wherefores" before acknowledging the superiority of one article over another. Among the few preparations that have stood the test, those manufactured by R. V. Pierce, M. D., of the World's Dispensary, Buffalo, N. Y., have for many years been foremost. The truth of any statement made concerning them can be easily ascertained, for Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy and Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery are now prescribed by many physicians in curing obstinate cases of Catarrh and incipient Consumption. The Discovery has no equal in curing Coughs, Colds, Bronchial and Nervous Affections. It allays all irritation of the mucous membrane, aids digestion, and when used with Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets readily overcomes torpid liver and Constipation, while the Favorite Prescription has no rival in the field of prepared medicine in curing diseases peculiar to females. If you wish to "know thyself," procure a copy of "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser," an illustrated book of nearly 1,000 pages, adapted to the wants of everybody. Price $1.50, postage prepaid. Address the author, R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

SWORN STATEMENT
OF A
BOSTON DRUGGIST.

Gentlemen,—I hereby certify that I have had Catarrh for ten years, and for the last six years have been a terrible sufferer. I was rendered partially deaf, had buzzing in the head, pains across the temple, dizzy spells, weak and painful eyes, swollen and ulcerated tonsils, hard and constant cough, severe pain across the chest, and every indication of consumption. My head ached all the time. The matter accumulated so rapidly in my head and throat that I could not keep them free. Frequently at night I would spring out of bed, it seemed to me, at the point of suffocation. I would then have recourse to every means in my power to dislodge the mucus from my throat and head before being able to sleep again. For a period of six years my tonsils were ulcerated and so much inflamed that I could with difficulty swallow. I finally consulted an eminent surgeon in regard to an operation on them, but at his request postponed it. The constant inflammation and ulceration in my throat, caused by the poisonous matter dropping down from my head, had so irritated and inflamed my lungs that I coughed incessantly,—a deep, hard cough. Meanwhile my system began to show the effects of this disease, so that I lost flesh, grew pale, and showed every symptom of an early death by consumption. When matters had reached this stage, or about six months ago, I began [illegible] SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE FOR CATARRH. [illegible] bottle I began to improve rapidly. [illegible] not known it to be for years. It seemed gradually to arrest the discharges. It stopped my cough in three days. By using it as a gargle I soon reduced the inflammation and swelling of my tonsils, so that they soon ceased to trouble me. The soreness across my chest disappeared, the buzzing noises in my head [illegible] pletely restored, and every symptom of disease that had reduced me to the verge of the grave disappeared by the use of SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE FOR CATARRH.

I have been thus explicit because, as a druggist, I have seen a great deal of suffering from Catarrh, and hope to convince many that this is a great remedy.

I am familiar with the treatment of Catarrh as practised by the best physicians, and have consulted the most eminent about my case. I have used every kind of remedy and apparatus that have appeared during a period of six years past, and have, while following their use, taken great care of my general health, but obtained no relief or encouragement from any of them.

Since curing myself with SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE, I have recommended it in over one hundred cases without a single case of failure, and have in numerous instances received wholesale orders from parties to whom I have sold one bottle. This is the only patent medicine I have ever recommended, never having believed in them before, although constantly engaged in their sale. Very gratefully yours,
BOSTON, Feb. 23, 1876. GEORGE F. DINSMORE.

SUFFOLK, ss. Feb. 23, 1876.
Then personally appeared the said George F. Dinsmore, and made oath that the foregoing statement by him subscribed is true. Before me,

AUBURN, INDIANA, FEB. 22, 1877.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

MONDAY, February 19th, 1877.

DEAR COURIER—The air is balmy, beautiful, the young tender grass forms almost a carpet of green on the parks and the shrill chipping of the English sparrow fills the air, and what other evidence does one want of the approach of mild ethereal spring. But there is an element at war with all this harmony in nature, and that is our political status to-day. What I most dreaded, and referred to as a possible result in my last, has really transpired, and the great American citizens can now look upon the sickening picture of the highest judicial body known to the land, prostituting itself to base partisan ends. There was a hope that the fine supreme judges on the commission would swing together, no matter which way the decision was given, yet the voting on each important question distinctly shows party predilection with every one of them. This condition of things with what we have heretofore considered a pure and upright body, is only attributable to the terrible political status which has been consuming the vitality of our government in the last decade, and has almost made self-government a sham and a mockery. I believe the people would have been eminently satisfied had this commission went to the bottom in these elections and then voted solidly for Hayes. But as it is, how are the people to construe it other than a purely partisan decision. It is the triumph of party, rather than of right and justice. The people came to the supreme court, distressed and perplexed, and asked it, or a controlling part of it, to save them from a terrible conspiracy, and the grossest frauds. They saw their faithless agents for years robbing the Treasury of their hard-earned taxes; they saw their highest officials indicted for the meanest crimes; they saw carpet-baggers sustained by bayonets manipulating the polls, that ignorance and rascality might tyranize over the south; they saw rings organized in the lobby control their Congress; they saw huge monopolies created by their government, eating out their substance; they saw themselves reduced to want, trade paralyzed and labor without employ, and they made a desperate effort to right their wrongs through the ballot.

With a subsidized press against them, with an army of hungry office-holders, that, counting those of the General Government with those of the States, make a horde of treasury eaters greater than any standing army in Europe; with all the accumulated capital in the hands of monopolies arrayed on the side of their oppressors—they made one despairing effort, and came up from the polls with a majority of over half million in their behalf. And of what avail?

Through a dishonest returning board, made up of criminals who have escaped conviction and punishment under the protecting arm of a corrupt Government, enough votes are thrown out to render all their efforts vain and saddle upon them the old corruption and old horde for another term of years.

From this an appeal was taken to five justices of the Supreme Court—for that, no more and no less, was the commission created. It was believed that by such process the question at issue, being a charge of conspiracy against certain corrupt men, could be lifted from the political arena to a tribunal of high-toned, impartial judges, who would decide in accordance with law and justice.

To the amazement and disgust of all thoughtful minds, these justices divided, as the partisans had, on a political line, and joined with the enemies of the people in fixing corruption upon us, and destroying all confidence in the very foundation of our political structure, the ballot. They decide that fraud does not vitiate, and beyond this, that they have nothing to decide, and so send the question to the people.

There is but little chance left now for a fair solution of who should be our next president. When the commission was agreed to, it was understood that Judge Davis was to be the fifth judge, because he was believed to be the only political independent man in that body. As soon as it was known that he would be selected Logan was sacrificed and by the aid of Republicans, Davis was made Senator, and then he was declared by the Republican press to be ineligible. The whole was a deep laid plan to count in Hayes. As to the admission of evidence before the commission, it was concluded in the discussion on the bill that every fact should be brought out, and the true result ascertained. One Senator offered an amendment in the Senate that a full investigation should be made, but withdrew it at the suggestion of Mr. Edmunds, who said it was conceded on all sides that such was the intention of the commission. No sooner did Grant sign the bill, than he began to change in his movements of troops here, as he had been let into the secret, that certain judges would vote all right, and Hayes would be the man. Of course these things are all done in secret, and an outsider can only take this and that and put it together to see the whole drift of things, like a muskrat in the water, you can see the ripple above, but little of the rat.

The Democrats held a caucus Saturday afternoon, and after a strong debate voted to continue the count under this partisan commission. Some of the western Democrats were strong against it, but an apparent weakness in the south, to stand for a fair count, carried the day against them. The Democrats are terribly indignant over the result, although little else was expected. They argue that when the bill was passed, they believed in good faith that it provided for them a board of arbitrators who would honestly go into the merits of the disputed points, and decide upon the facts as shown, whatever they might be. Such was the intention of the bill as expressed by the Republicans who engineered it, especially Senator Edmunds. He was known to have assured various prominent Democrats before the bill became a law, it was meant [illegible] investigation of all matters in dispute, so that the country could be satisfied with the judgment. The Democrats, after their repeated partisan rulings and exclusion of evidence on the very questions which the tribunal was supposed to decide, are disposed to repudiate the whole affair from the beginning to the end. They argue there has been no inquiry whatever into the questions which were perplexing the country, for that reason the commission has not met the anticipations of the public. The commission voted eight times, and every time 8 to 7 was announced. Mr. Morrison said he stuck to his original proposition that the seven spot never could take the eight.

Senator Bayard said the decision of the commission was a very sad one; sad on account of its far-reaching effects. Under the decision just made all protection of the states was gone. The precedent established by this tribunal made it possible for the members of the House of Representatives of the United States, senators, federal officials of any sort or character, officers in the army, even, to be made members of the electoral college, and that there would be no power to reach them. He also said that under this same decision there was no bar against an alien, a man convicted of treason, or even Jefferson Davis, from becoming President, provided they had been voted for in the different states and regularly certified to by so-called state governments. The opinion of the Commission was one that had no basis in law or fact—it was a decision made solely to fit the case. Mr. Bayard, however, reaffirmed his belief in the original bill, and said if it had been followed according to the spirit of those who had prepared it he believes the Democrats would not only have had a reasonable show, but would have been morally certain of victory. Notwithstanding, his opinion, he says that he does not know of a single Democratic member of the Commission who intends to resign. They intend to stand to the bill to the very last. Whatever the the result may be, they will rigidly perform their part of the original bargain.

The Republicans claim a sure thing now for Hayes, but I notice they do not seem to enjoy their victory with as much zest as it ought to bring. To count Hayes in by a majority of one, and that one a party vote, to exclude all evidence and investigation where fraud is known to exist, to face a popular majority of over a quarter of a million of votes, hardly brings to his inauguration that prestige that a great man would look upon as far more to be desired than position. In fact I should hate to see Tilden go in under similar circumstances.

Fort Wayne is quarreling about the handsome men. One man says he is prettier than another, and the other denies. We don't think there is any occasion to quarrel about such a small matter, for they are all handsome as "sunflowers."

A bill has passed the House allowing the commissioners of each county in the state to send two students to Purdue University. This school wants an appropriation of nearly $100 000 and must have an annual appropriation to keep it up.

The Butler Record has at last made its appearance, looking neat and tasty, filled with local and sarcasm. It gives the Republican of this place, a pretty sharp stab, which, being in its infancy rather surprises us. Never mind, Bro. Bacon, if you can keep the Record afloat long enough, you too may get a gold-headed cane.

A letter from the gorgeous Thoman, dated Columbus, Ohio, requests us to say he did not leave the Courier office in a questionable manner.—Waterloo Press.

We don't know as anyone questioned Mr. Thoman's manner of leaving, it was his manner of staying that was questioned. Nevertheless, Mr. Frank Moody would like to question him about a few things.

Miss. Littlefield has withdrawn from the Presbyterian choir and will visit in Michigan. Miss. Sadie Hare will fill the vacancy.—Republican.

Some mistake about that Bro. Weamer, as Miss. Littlefield informs us that she knows nothing of "hervisit to Michigan," and to our certain knowledge she has not withdrawn from the choir, but will be found in her place every Sabbath.

There will be a grand spelling match at Ensley's Hall on the 9th of next month, the winner to receive a ten dollar gold piece, or a Websters Unabridged Dictionary whichever he chooses. This will be a grand affair, and a good opportunity to analise your wits with the best spellers of the county. Any one living in the county can compete for the prize. Who goes down first and who goes down last is the question.

We are informed that the B. & O. Company, are about to assume controle of the Eel River and Canada Southern Roads, and will move all the shops now at Garrett, to the Junction. It will be a good thing for the Junction, as also for Auburn. We do not pretend to say this is an established fact, but time will speak for itself, in thunder tones, which will shake Garrett from center to circumference.

The alarm of fire was again sounded last Saturday morning at about nine o'clock. The Rev. Mann has been holding protected meetings at the M. E. Church the past ten days. Success attend his efforts

One day last week a man by the name of Albert Livingston, whose ostensible business is selling a certain powder to render coal oil non-explosive, called at the residence of Benjamin Hoyt, in what is called the Coburn settlement. Mr. Hoyt and all of his family, except his young daughter, aged about sixteen years, was absent from home. The young lady informed the scamp the family was not at home and declined to purchase his powder offering as a reason that she had no money, when he with impudence that characterizes that class of men, began to search the house for money, and succeed in capturing a dime in some obscure corner, and then informed the young lady that if she would find five cents more she could have a box of the powder. The young lady being much frightened finely succeeded in finding the requisite amount and handed it to him, and requested him to leave the house at once. He then insisted upon having a kiss, which the young lady indignantly declined; the villian then siezed the young lady and forcibly imprinted a kiss upon her lips; she shriek for help and the villian fled. A warrant was issued and the gentleman was arrested and taken before Justice Williman who very properly fined the rascal fifteen dollars, only it ought to have been more.

The young daughter of our townsman J. R. Nichols, aged six months, died on the 16th. The funeral services were held in the Lutheran church on the afternoon of the 17th.

Quite a young stanger put in an appearance at the residence of O. W. Rummell one day last week. I believe it is of the male persuasion.

Last Friday evening after the close of the meeting at the M. The young ladies, though much frightened, managed to haul the matting out the aisles and succeed in smothering the flames before any great amount of damage was done.

The son of Geo. Shutt, aged about sixteen years, died last Sunday evening.

Having purchased the Patterson Bros. & Co.'s stock of goods, and wishing to dispose of them as quickly as possible I have concluded to sell them at cost, on 9 month's credit, the purchaser giving his note with six per cent. interest and security. Communication.

Editor Courier:—One article in the first number of the Butler Record attracted public attention, from the fact that it was characterized by such a pharasical intolerance, such a spirit of vindictiveness, and contained so little christian charity, that were it written in better style, it might have been accredited to one of those religious bigots to whom Christ remarked in olden times, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone.

I refer to the article entitled, "The Climax of Shame," in which the author attempted to manufacture public opinion against Hankins, the man who has been examined before a justice court in this town on the charge of having attempted to commit a rape on his own daughter.

If the author had confined himself to a simple statemen of the facts, with no attempt to pervert them, he would not have laid himself so completely open to criticism, but when he made so fierce and bitter an attack upon a fellow-man, who is bereft of money, honor and friends, and then in order to still blacken the poison that flowed from his pen, he deliberately misstates the facts, neither his position nor his clercial robes should shield him from the censure he so justly merits.

He builds the whole of this ungramatical phillippic upon the assumption that the whole charge was established beyond the possible chance of a refutation.

But such is not the case. Hankins was tried before an examinary court, where it only requires a balance of evidence to warrant the court in recognizing the prisoner to appear at the Circuit Court.

All the evidence against him was furnished by his dauuhter, who, it is evident, is under the control of her mother.

For three months the wife of Hankins has been endeavoring to obtain his arrest on one pretext and another, and to my certain knowledge she has made three different affidavits charging him with three different crimes, before she made one upon which he was tried. At the trial there was one witness for, and one against the prisoner, and it then depended upon their creditability.

It is therefore evident that his guilt has not been established beyond a reasonable doubt, and for the reason we believe the writer of the article in question was either actuated by a desire to manufacture public opinion or else he was moved by a silly wish to exercise a poor faculty of stringing invectives together to form a tirade of abuse.

The article possesses all the religious bigotry, bitterness, and intolerance, with none of the elegant language of the course of ex-communication of the church of Rome.

The language at times exhibits such a labored attempt at soaring in the nebulous clouds of rhetoric, that it would appear laughable were it not that the effort to be bitterly abusive is manifest in every line. That he does not succeed in this, is owing, not to a lack of energy in the work, but to the fact that his language is as poverty stricten as his charity, and his ideas are as hide-bound as his professed christianity.

The citizens of this community will agree with me in saying that the article to which I have referred is in bad taste, uncalled for and out of place, that it is making a cowardly attack upon a man who is unable to defend himself, and has no friends to speak for him. For these reasons I ask a place for this in your columns

THE WEST.

GEN. MILES has forwarded to military headquarters at Chicago a report of his engagement with the hostile tribes of Sioux and Cheyenne Indians under Crazy Horse, fought on the 8th of January. The fight lasted five hours. The Indian camp of 600 lodges extended three miles along the valley of the Tongue river below Hanging Womans' creek. They were driven through the canons of Wolf or Panther mountains in the direction of the Big Horn mountains. The Indian loss is known to be severe. Gen. Miles lost four killed and eight wounded. The hostiles were well armed, but otherwise appeared to be in a destitute condition. A number of prisoners were captured with frozen limbs, and were living on horse meat.... Advices from Arizona state the Apache Indians are killing and plundering the settlers in the southeastern part of the Territory. The Governor has sent a message to the Territorial Legislature asking for an appropriation of money to raise and equip a force of whites and friendly Indians to carry on a rigorous campaign against the hostiles. He expresses the fear that under the present condition of affairs, Southeastern Arizona must be abandoned by white settlers.

AT Toledo, Ohio, the other day, a lad named Charles Kruck, 16 years of age, was sent by his mother to a grocery store to make some purchases for her. The store had a gin-mill attachment, in which three brutes were carousing. They made the lad drunk, and then induced him to wander off with them. In their walks they came to a high bridge over a creek. The boy looked down on the ice below, said, "I guess I'll take a dive," and, imitating such an action, sprang over the railing and struck upon his head upon the ice below, crushing his skull and killing himself instantly.

THE exceptions taken to the rulings and sentence of John D. Lee, the Mountain Meadow murderer, have been overruled by the Supreme Court of Utah Territory, and the District Court has been ordered to fix another day for the execution. Lee's only hope now lies in an appeal to the United States Supreme Court.... Spotted Tail, chief of the Sioux Indians, accompanied by 200 warriors, has left Spotted Tail agency for Tongue river, for the purpose of counseling Crazy Horse and his band of hostiles to accept the terms offered by the Government, viz., to surrender their arms and ponies.

TWO SIOUX Indians, Charging Horse and Makes-Them-Stand-Up, lately arrived at Spotted Tail Agency, direct from the hostile camp. They report that Crazy Horse, with all the hostiles except the Uncapapas, were encamped on Tongue river, near the mouth of Prairie Dog creek; that Sitting Bull, with his contingent, is on this side of the Yellowstone, marching to join them; that all desire to make peace on the best terms obtainable; and that they themselves are official couriers to notify Gen. Crook that such are the facts.... The principal business portion of the town of Urbana, Ohio, has been destroyed by fire. Loss, $75,000.... Mrs. M. Schurz, the mother of Hon. Carl Schurz, died at the latter's residence, in St. Louis, a few days ago.

THE SOUTH.

A BRILLIANT ball was given at the navy yard, Norfolk, Va., last week, in honor of the Russian Grand Duke Alexis.

MARTIN HENRY and William Henry Simpson, both colored, were hung at Port Tobacco, Md., on the 9th of February, for the murder of John W. Everett.

A DISPATCH from Cartersville, Ga., says that Lieut. McIntyre, of the Second Infantry, was killed in the Frog mountains by illicit distillers in ambush, attacks upon the Government forces having been made by distillers, thirty in number, under cover of night.... Ex-Congressman James S. Johnson, of Owensboro, Ky., recently committed suicide by shooting himself through the heart with a rifle.

A FIRE at Dardanelle, Ark., last week, destroyed $75,000 worth of property.... The Mardi Gras festivities this year in New Orleans, Memphis, Galveston, and other cities, were unusually brilliant.

NEW ORLEANS was thrown into a state of the wildest excitement, the other day, by an attempted assassination of Gov. Packard. A young man, representing himself to be an attache of the Philadelphia Press and a former army officer, called on Packard and was admitted to his private office, where several gentlemen were seated. He sat down for a few minutes, and then asked the Governor how long it would be before he could speak with him. The latter looked up and replied, "In a moment." The assassin, who, in the meantime had arisen from his seat and approached Packard, drew a pistol and presented it at his intended victim's head. Quick as a flash the latter brought his hand down just as the weapon was discharged, and the ball, instead of entering the head, struck the Governor's knee-pan, inflicting a painful but not dangerous wound. Gov. Packard then caught the fellow by the throat and threw him violently against the wall before he had an opportunity to fire again, and struck him. During the excitement that followed the assassin was shot in the arm, and would have been killed had not the Governor interfered.

POLITICAL.

EX-GOV. STEARNS, of Florida, was before the House Privileges Committee, on the 9th inst. He testified that he never received or sent any telegram saying that we (meaning the Republicans) must have Louisiana, Florida and South Carolina, by fair means or foul. Never received a telegram from anybody outside the State requesting him to send couriers for returns which must be made to show a majority for Hayes. He said, the dispatch from W. E. Chandler, "Bismarck ought to come here at once," was sent to C. D. Willard, of Washington, and had reference to railroad matters. Nothing was said about money in any telegram which passed between himself and persons in the North, and he also said he had no knowledge of any money having been received from the North either before or after the election.... A. B. Levisee, one of the Hayes electors in Louisiana, was examined by the Senate committee. He testified that on the 4th of December last, in New Orleans, one S. M. Asher, claiming to act as the agent of Democrats, approached him with an offer of $30,000 to cast his vote in the Electoral College for Tilden. Levisee rejected the offer, when, as he claims, the bribe was raised to $100,000. Levisee held out for $200,000, and the negotiation fell through. Levisee's story is that he set the figure higher than he thought could be paid, and claims that his purpose in the affair was only to see how far the Democrats would go.... C. Irving Ditty, of Maryland, one of the "visiting statesmen" at New Orleans during the count, was called before the House committee, and testified to the bad reputation of Maddox as to truth and veracity, and said he would not believe him on oath. Witness admitted, in answer to a question, that he was at Littlefield's quadroon ball in New Orleans. A number of other gentlemen of both visiting committees were there, including Lyman Trumbull. An excited war of words occurred at this point between members of the committee and witness, Mr. Sparks having said he believed Judge Trumbull would designate witness' story as stuff. Capt. Ditty replied angrily that if the Chairman meant to insinuate that his (witness') statement was untrue, he (the Chairman) assumed something which he had no right to assume. Witness continued—All parties went to the ball as a matter of curiosity. One of the features of the ball was a woman with pink eyes.

JOHN T. MENCHAM, one of the clerks of the Louisiana Returning Board, was before the House prerogative committee on the 10th. He testified that some affidavits were made by clerks of the board in the compiling-room. Don't know whether they were used. Most any name was signed to affidavits. Dec. 2 witness saw with Littlefield and Maj. Eaton a slip of paper containing the total of the electoral vote. The majority of these of the Democrats was about 4,000. Saw afterward that a change had been made in the figures. Heard Gov. Wells in conversation with Littlefield in Abell's office, Dec. 2. Could not hear what they said. Dec. 6 saw them again in conversation in a very low tone in a clerk's room. Saw Littlefield take from a desk a paper and make some erasures about a quarter of an hour after conversing with Gov. Wells. The committee examined Postmaster General Tyner relative to the resignation of Watts, the alleged ineligible Oregon elector, and elicited the fact that the latter resigned his postmastership, by telegraph, on Nov. 13, 1876. The written resignation was not received at the department until Dec. 2. Watts' successor as Postmaster was appointed Nov. 28.

THE politicians who have been prospecting for bonanzas in the shape of Federal offices in the Black Hills are doomed to disappointment for the present. WASHINGTON.

THE case of ex-Secretary Belknap was finally disposed of, in the Criminal Court of the District of Columbia, last week. The District-Attorney entered a nolle prosequi, saying that he did so by direction of the Attorney General. The Attorney General's report, which was filed in the case, contained an indorsement by the President approving this course, giving as reasons the improbability of a conviction, "the long suffering of the ex-Secretary, and the great expense to which he has been subjected."... Suit has been commenced in one of the Washington courts against Senator Simon Cameron by a female department clerk, for breach of promise. The lady—a Pennsylvania widow, fair and forty—claims $50,000 damages. Senator Cameron says that the suit is stimulated by blackmailers, who will be exposed. FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

FRIDAY, Feb. 9.—SENATE.—Bills were introduced appropriating $7,000 to defray the expenses of the Electoral Commission, and to authorize and equip an expedition to the Arctic seas, according to the plans suggested by Capt. Howgate.... The bill to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Europe was passed. It incorporates a company to construct a new Atlantic cable, with the American end at Baltimore.... The bill to amend the Pacific Railroad acts was debated.

HOUSE.—The House passed the Deficiency Appropriation bill, and the bill to provide for the distribution of the Mexican claims awards.... Mr. Morrison, Chairman of the special committee on Louisiana affairs, submitted the report of that committee, which concludes with a resolution declaring that the Democratic electors received a majority of votes in the State of Louisiana; that the pretended canvass and compilation of votes for electors by the Board of Returning officers was without authority of law, fraudulent, and void, and that the vote of that State cannot be counted for Hayes and Wheeler without the confirmation and approval of illegal and fraudulent action by said Returning Board......Mr. Townsend submitted a minority report recommending the adoption of a resolution declaring that the Republican electors have been elected in Louisiana, and that the election was examined into, determined, declared and promulgated by the proper authorities of said State, under all the forms of law, and in compliance with the constitution of the United States. Both reports were ordered printed and recommitted.

SATURDAY, Feb. 10.—JOINT SESSION.—Precisely at 1 o'clock the Senators took their seats in joint session with the House members, and President Ferry took the chair. The decision of the Electoral Commission having been read, written objections were made to it by Representative Field on the part of five Senators and twelve Representatives, and then the two houses separated.

SENATE.—The Chair presented a communication from the President of the Electoral Commission, informing the Senate that it has decided upon the matters submitted concerning the electoral votes from Florida. The objections to the decisions of the commission submitted by Mr. Field were read. A long debate took place as to the form of the questions sustaining or overruling the objections filed by Field, and an order submitted by Mr. Whyte that the Senate do not concur in the decision made by the commission created under the act approved Jan. 29, 1877, but that the votes cast by Wilkinson, Col. Robert Bullock, J. B. Yonge and R. B. Hinton as the electors of Florida are the true and lawful votes for President and Vice President of that State, and should be counted as the electoral vote of the State, was defeated by a strict party vote—all the Democratic Senators present voting in the affirmative, and the Republicans in the negative. The following resolution, offered by Mr. Sherman, was then adopted by a strict party vote—44 to 25: "Resolved, That the decision of the commission upon the electoral votes of the State of Florida stand as the judgment of the Senate, the objections made thereto to the contrary notwithstanding." The Secretary was directed to notify the House that the Senate had reached a determination in regard to the Electoral Commission, and was ready to meet the House for the purpose of proceeding with the count.

HOUSE.—After the Senate had retired from the hall of the House a motion was made by a Democratic member to take a recess. Hale made the point of order that a recess could not now be taken. A long discussion followed, participated in by Messrs. McCrary, Kasson, Wilson and Banks, Republicans, and Warren, Jones and Sayler, Democrats—the former opposing and the latter advocating a recess. Speaker Randall maintained that, according to the spirit of the Electoral Commission act, it was competent for the House to take a recess, and overruled the point of order. Mr. Hale appealed from the decision. Mr. Cox moved to lay the appeal on the table, which was carried—156 to 78. The motion to take a recess till Monday was then carried—163 to 106.

MONDAY, Feb. 12.—SENATE.—No business was transacted in the Senate. At 2:30 p. m., in response to a notification from the House, it proceeded to the Representatives' chamber for the purpose of resuming the count of the electoral votes.

HOUSE.—Mr. Knott offered a resolution to recommit the Florida case back to the Electoral Commission. Messrs. Hale and Wilson raised points of order that the resolution was out of order, and that the House had no power to refer anything to the commission. The Speaker sustained the point of order, and said that only the joint convention of the two houses could refer the matter to the tribunal. The debate on sustaining the decision was then begun, and was carried on with much warmth and earnestness. The Speaker was sustained in his decision, the vote standing 167 to 97. The resolution declaring the Tilden electors in Florida elected was agreed to by a vote of 168 to 103. A resolution was then passed informing the Senate that the House was ready to proceed with the count.

JOINT SESSION.—The Senate entered, and the joint convention was called to order. The resolutions of the Senate and House in reference to the vote of Florida were read, and Mr. Ferry said that, as the two houses did not agree, the decision would stand. The tellers then recorded four votes for Hayes and Wheeler. The convention then proceeded to count, the State of Georgia being first after Florida. No objection being interposed to the vote of Georgia, the eleven votes were counted for Tilden and Hendricks. Next followed in succession the State of Illinois, with twenty-one for Hayes and Wheeler; Indiana, with fifteen votes for Tilden and Hendricks; Iowa, with eleven votes for Hayes and Wheeler; Kansas, with five votes for Hayes and Wheeler; Kentucky, with twelve votes for Tilden and Hendricks. Then came a certificate from Louisiana, showing eight votes for Hayes, authenticated by Kellogg as Governor; this was followed by the opening of another certificate showing eight votes for Tilden, authenticated by McEnery as Governor. Still a third certificate was read, purporting to be authenticated by Desionda, Secretary of State, with votes for Hayes. The presiding officer opened and presented another certificate received by mail, no corresponding one having been received by messenger. It was obvious from the first sentence it was a mere burlesque. It commenced by certifying that John Smith had been chosen elector from the First District; John Smith No. 2 from the Second; John Smith No. 3 from the Third; John Smith No. 4 from the Fourth; John Smith No. 5 from the Fifth; John Smith No. 6 from the Sixth; and John Smith and John Smith to be electors at large. It followed the usual formalities, and certified that the eight electoral votes of Louisiana had been cast for Cooper and Cary. The paper purported to be signed by "John Smith, Company 2, Bulldozers, Governor of Louisiana," and wound up with the motto, "Such is life in Louisiana." Subsequently the presiding officer directed the paper to be omitted from the proceedings of the joint convention. Senator McDonald submitted an objection to the Hayes and Wheeler certificates, on the ground that the Hayes electors had been duly elected; that their election had not been certified by William P. Kellogg, who claimed to be, but in fact was not, Governor of the State of Louisiana, and because the Returning Board of said State was without jurisdiction, for the reason that the laws of Louisiana conferred no power on the Returning Board to canvass or compile the votes, since they constituted but four of the five persons required by law, since these four were of the same political party, and since there was a vacancy in said board, which four members had refused to fill; because four members of the Returning Board had full knowledge that the true compilation of votes would have shown that the Tilden electors had been duly elected; because said board had offered for money to sell the State of Louisiana, and because A. B. Levisee and O. H. Brewster, of the Republican electors, held offices of trust under the Government of the United States at the time of their appointment as electors. The objection is signed by McDonald, Stevenson, Saulsbury, Bogy, Senators; Jenks, Wilson, Tucker, Levy, Ellis and Morrison, Representatives. Messrs. Gibson and Wood, of New York, submitted further objections, in behalf of the Democrats, to the Hayes electors. Mr. Howe submitted objections to the Tilden certificates, on the ground that there was no evidence that those electors had been appointed in such manner as the Legislature directed; while there was evidence conclusive in law that neither of them had been so appointed; also on the ground that there was no evidence that McEnery was Governor of Louisiana in the year 1876, while there was conclusive evidence that Kellogg was during the year 1876 and for several years prior thereto Governor of that State, and was recognized as such by the judicial and legislative departments of Louisiana, and by the departments of the Government of the United States. All of the certificates from Louisiana, with the papers accompanying them, were then sent to the Electoral Commission for judgment and decision, and the Senate withdrew to its chamber.

TUESDAY, Feb. 13.—SENATE.—The credentials of D. T. Corbin, as Senator from South Carolina, signed by Gov. Chamberlain, were read and filed.... A number of petitions and resolutions of minor interest were presented and referred.... The Senate, after considerable discussion, ordered the arrest of Conrad N. Jourdan, Cashier of the Third National Bank of New York, who had failed to appear and testify as to the bank accounts of Samuel J. Tilden, William T. Pelton and Abram S. Hewitt.

HOUSE.—The bill to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe was passed.... The report of the committee on election in Florida, declaring the Tilden electors chosen in that State, was taken up and debated. Mr. Purman, the Republican member from Florida, ventilated his views upon Florida politics, denounced the State Canvassing Board as dishonest and corrupt, and claimed that Tilden carried the State. A number of other speeches were delivered, but without reaching a vote on the report the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 14.—SENATE.—A bill was passed removing the political disabilities of Joseph E. Johnston, of Virginia.... The bill appropriating $7,000 to pay the expenses of the Electoral Commission was passed.... Mr. Sargent, from the conference committee on the bill appropriating $260,000 to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding during the current fiscal year, made a report, which was agreed to, and the bill passed. It provides that from and after the present session of Congress the Congressional Printer shall not pay a price exceeding fifty cents per 1,000 ems for composition and forty cents an hour for time-work in binding, etc.

HOUSE.—The resolutions reported by the special committee charged with the investigation of the recent election in Florida were taken up, and the majority resolution, declaring the Tilden electors chosen, was adopted by a strict party vote with the exception of Mr. Purman, of Florida, who voted in the affirmative.... The remainder of the day was devoted to the consideration of the Naval Appropriation bill.

THURSDAY, Feb. 15.—SENATE.—The Senate devoted most of the day to the consideration of the bill in relation to the Pacific railroad sinking fund and the bill for the support of the Government of the District of Columbia.

HOUSE.—The House voted against the removal of the Indians to the Indian Territory. The subject came up in connection with the bill to ratify the treaty made with the Sioux, Arapahoes and Cheyennes, and to provide for their removal from the Black Hills. The bill was passed, with an amendment proposed by Mills, of Texas, which prohibits the removal of the Indians to the Indian Territory. ....The bill for the regulation of the rates of toll over the Omaha bridge was discussed, but no vote was taken.

THE ELECTORAL TRIBUNAL.

FRIDAY, Feb. 9.—The commission was occupied, in secret session, from 10 a. m. to 6 p. m., in debate upon the Florida case, in which every one of the fifteen members by turns participated. Two or three of the Judges and several of the Senatorial members read elaborately prepared opinions upon the main points at issue, and the discussion is understood to have been, from its commencement to its close, of extraordinary power and ability. At the close of the debate Senator Edmunds submitted a resolution declaring, in substance, that the four Republican electors in Florida were elected. Representative Hunton offered a substitute declaring the Tilden electors elected. This substitute was rejected by the following vote: Yeas—Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, Thurman—7. Nays—Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, Strong—8. Senator Edmunds then withdrew his resolution, and Representative Garfield offered the following: "Resolved, That four persons, to wit: Frederick C. Humphreys, Charles W. Pearce, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, were duly appointed electors of President and Vice President for the State of Florida, and that the votes cast by the aforesaid four persons are the votes provided for by the constitution of the United States." This was adopted by the following vote: Yeas—Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, Strong—8. Nays—Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, Thurman—7. On motion of Mr. Garfield, Messrs. Edmunds, Bradley and Miller were appointed a committee to draft a report of the decision of the commission, with a brief statement of the reasons therefor, to be signed by the members agreeing therein, and to be transmitted to the joint session of the two houses as required by the Electoral act.

SATURDAY, Feb. 10.—The commission reassembled in the afternoon, and, after the reading of the journal, adjourned until 10 a. m. Monday.

MONDAY, Feb. 12.—The commission assembled in the afternoon, and received the certificates and accompanying papers in the case of Louisiana from the presiding officer of the joint convention of Congress. An adjournment till Tuesday was then voted.

TUESDAY, Feb. 13.—The commission entered upon the consideration of the Louisiana case, and listened to the arguments of counsel assigned to the duty of appearing for the objectors. Senator McDonald led on behalf of the Democrats. He said in the election of 1872 the vote of Louisiana had been rejected because the Returning Board had not complied with the law, and they now proposed to show the law had not been complied with in the present case. A popular majority had been returned in one way, and that majority had been reversed by this board, through actual fraud. They had thrown aside the returns sent them by the proper officers, and had taken the reports of the Supervisors of Registration in their place, but even this they did not follow at all times. The people of sixty-nine polls had been disfranchised. Mr. McDonald maintained that the commission had the right, and it was their duty, to consider the information in possession of the two houses. Their duties were judicial, not merely clerical, and he conjured them to carefully weigh the evidence in the possession of the two houses for which they were acting. Mr. Jenks followed on the same side, and proceeded to review the election in the several parishes, taking as a basis of facts the testimony before the House Louisiana investigating committee, with the incidental claim that this testimony was proper evidence to be considered by the commission. In conclusion, he asked that the moral light of the universe might be allowed to shine upon this transaction, and the nation be free from the vile act of this Returning Board. Mr. Hurlbut, for the Republicans, argued that Kellogg was the legal Governor of Louisiana at the recent election, and that McEnery had no shadow of claim to the office. Hence the Hayes electors were the only ones that were properly and legally elected and certified to. He also argued at length against the admission of evidence and going behind the returns, declaring that the Returning Board was a legal body, and its decision final. Mr. Howe next addressed the commission on behalf of the Republican objectors. His argument was directed mainly to showing the legality of the Kellogg certificates, and the irregularity of those made up by a man who had no valid claim to the office. Senator Carpenter followed on behalf of the Democratic objecters. He said he did not appear for Samuel J. Tilden, a gentleman whom he did not know, and with whom he had no sympathy, but he "appeared for 10,000 legal voters of Louisiana who had been disfranchised by four villains whose official title is the 'Returning Board of Louisiana.'" Mr. Carpenter held that the powers of the commission were not judicial; that it was nothing more than a committee of investigation, inasmuch as Congress, according to the terms of the law creating it, had the power to approve or reverse its decision, as it saw fit. He then went into an analysis of the statute law of Louisiana relating to elections, returning boards, etc., and claimed that the Election law of the State for appointing electors is in violation of the constitution of the State and of the United States. The commission adjourned before Mr. Carpenter concluded his argument.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 14.—On the reassembling of the commission ex-Senator Carpenter resumed his argument, contending that the constitution of the United States forbade conferring judicial power upon the Returning Board of the United States, and that the law of the State which attempted to confer such power was void. The Returning Board, had it possessed judicial powers, had gone outside its privilege. The statute required duplicate returns to be made within twenty-four hours, and such returns were not made within fifteen days. He denounced in bitter terms the members of the Returning Board, and said a careful and thorough examination of the case by the commission would do more to restore peace in Louisiana than a regiment of soldiers. At the conclusion of Mr. Carpenter's argument, propositions were introduced to discuss the admissibility of evidence in the Louisiana case, and to debate the whole case. The former prevailed, the latter being rejected. After a short recess, Lyman Trumbull took the floor and proceeded with his argument, saying that they were brought face to face with the question whether a President of the United States is to be made through fraud and villainy on the part of officials whose duty it was to issue the certificates. There was no other tribunal to which application could be made except this tribunal. He spoke of the tribunal as the tribunal of the two houses of Congress. Could it be, he asked, that the constitution had made no provision against the inauguration of a President by forgery and fraud, and by a conspiracy between the men who certify to his election? He felt humiliated that as a citizen of this republic he was called upon to argue this question before a national tribunal. Mr. Trumbull argued that it was not only the right but the duty of the commission to go to the very bottom of the case, and ascertain who were the legally-elected electors in Louisiana. He went into a general review of Louisiana affairs, and made what is claimed to be the ablest argument in behalf of Tilden yet delivered before the commission. He was followed by E. W. Stoughton on the Republican side, who argued that the Returning Board was a legal body, and had power to apportion the vote and finally certify it. It seemed to him that the decision of the commission in the Florida case determined the entire question here raised as to the right of the commission to go behind the action of the Returning Board, and he could not perceive that any question (much less the main question) was now open for argument. In conclusion he said: "Talk to me about outrage, frauds and disfranchisement of voters. There are two sides of the question, and if you sit here to go back and canvass votes, you sit here to administer the laws of Louisiana, and you must administer them by learning who have been disfranchised, and what was the lawful vote of that State in harmony with her laws, and not in harmony with the will of a party." Mr. Shellabarger next addressed the commission on the same side. He argued that Kellogg was the rightful Governor of Louisiana, that the Returning Board was a legal body, that the electors objected to were not ineligible, and that it is not competent for the commission to go behind the action of the Returning Board for the purpose of finding out what happened in its exercise of jurisdiction bestowed by the statute.

THURSDAY, Feb. 15.—Argument on the admissibility of evidence in the Louisiana case was resumed. William M. Evarts, of Republican counsel, spoke against the admission of evidence, and Judge John A. Campbell closed on the Democratic side in favor of receiving testimony. At the conclusion of the speeches the court went into secret session, and, after an hour's debate, adjourned.

THE STATE OF TRADE.

THOMAS R. AGNEW, a heavy New York wholesale grocer, has failed. His liabilities are $884,000.

A SERIOUS strike is threatened by some of the English colliers, who are unwilling to accept a reduction of wages.

THE business of London, as measured by the clearings of the banks, decreased 11 1-10 per cent. in the last four months of 1876 compared with the corresponding period of 1875.

A CONGRESSIONAL committee has under consideration the propriety of recommending that a Government contract be given to some line of American steamers between this country and Brazil. It appears that the South is a vigorous bidder for this contract, and that New Orleans, backed by St. Louis, is making argument before the committee to secure it.

GOLD is fast pouring into France, according to the Paris correspondent of the London Economist. The supplies of that metal which are now being driven out of Russia by its paper currency are taken by France. There are also large importations from England. In one week the amount sent from London to Paris was $3,000,000, and the movement was continuing.

BUCK & HUNTING, a large banking firm at Sag Harbor, Long Island, N. Y., has collapsed. Their liabilities are $500,000. For a great number of years the firm has done business in Sag Harbor, and had the confidence of the people of the island. They handled the savings of all the industrious of the place, and the sufferers by the failure are to be found in almost every station of life. It will occasion much want and suffering.

THE January transactions at the clearing-houses of the principal cities do not indicate any material improvement in business thus far, all of them showing a marked falling off as compared with the same period last year. The loss at Philadelphia is surprisingly large. St. Louis also shows a considerable decline in transactions, and the decline at New Orleans is greater than the average. At Baltimore precisely the average decline appears, and at all the other cities the loss is less than 8 per cent.

THE English are going wild over American beef and mutton. Of late years these items of the Briton's bill of fare have been too expensive for the majority of people; and the efforts to import rabbit meat and beef from Australia, and cattle and beef from Brazil, have failed either to bring prices down or give satisfaction in any form. American beef and mutton exactly meet the need of the hour in every way. They reach England in splendid condition, and sell from 4d a pound for bits to 9d a pound for choice pieces, which is 2d or 3d less than the price of the home article. Connoisseurs declare that American beef and mutton bear evidences of being better fed. The press is in rhapsodies, and cannot mention the subject without quotations from Virgil and Dickens. The trade is growing very large, 700 tons sometimes arriving at Liverpool in one day. It sells immediately, and is now marketed in London, Liverpool, Manchester, Sheffield, Birmingham, Nottingham, and many other towns.

THE City Council of Wichita, Kan., has been petitioned to appropriate $2,600 to the establishment of a public library and reading-room.

THE FLORIDA CASE.

The Grounds Upon Which the Electoral Commission Render Their Decision.

The Electoral Commission state the grounds of their decision in the case of Florida as follows: That it is not competent under the constitution and law, as it existed at the date of the passage of the act constituting the commission, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two houses, to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the Governor of Florida, according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the Board of State Canvassers prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors; or by counter proof to show they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts or acts of the Legislature or of the Executive of Florida subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day are inadmissible for any such purpose. As to the objection made to the eligibility of Humphreys, the commission is of the opinion that, without reference to the question of the effect of the ineligible elector, the evidence does not show he held the office of Shipping Commissioner on the day when the electors were appointed. The commission also decided that, as a consequence of the foregoing, and upon the grounds before stated, neither of the papers purporting to be the certificates of the electoral voters of Florida are the certificates of votes provided for by the constitution of the United States, and they ought not to be counted as such.

The Democratic Objections.

The objections to the decision interposed in the House recite:

First—That the decision determined that the vote cast by Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, as electors of President and Vice President of the United States on behalf of Florida, is the true and legal electoral vote of the State, when in truth and in fact the vote cast by Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert E. Hilton, and Robert Bullock is the true and lawful vote of the State.

Second—That the commission refused to receive competent and material evidence tending to prove the first-named set were not appointed electors in the manner prescribed by the Legislature of the State, but were designated as electors by the Returning Board of the State corruptly and fraudulently, in disregard of law, and with intent to defeat the will of the people.

Third—That the decision was founded upon the resolution and order of the commission previously made.

Fourth—That the decision excludes all evidence taken by the two houses of Congress, by the committees of each house, concerning frauds, errors and irregularities committed by persons whose certificates are taken as proof of due appointment of the electors.

Fifth—That the decision excludes all evidence tending to prove the certificate of Stearns (Governor), as also of the Board of State Canvassers, was procured or given in pursuance of a fraudulent and corrupt conspiracy.

Sixth—That the commission refused to recognize the right of the courts of the State to review and reverse the judgment of the Returning Board or Board of State Canvassers rendered through fraud without jurisdiction, and rejected and refused to consider the action of the courts in a case lawfully brought before the court which had jurisdiction.

Seventh—That the decision excludes all evidence tending to prove that Florida, by all the departments of the Government, legislative, executive and judicial, had decreed as fraudulent all certificates of Stearns (Governor) as well as that of the State Canvassers, upon which certificates the commission has acted, and by means of which the true electoral votes of Florida have been rejected and false ones substituted.

Eighth—That to count the votes of Pearce, Humphreys, Holden and Long as electors for President and Vice President would be in violation of the constitution of the United States.

The objections are signed by Senators Jones (Fla.), Cooper, Barnum, Kernan, Saulsbury and McDonald; Representatives Knott, Field, Holman, Tucker, Thompson (Mass.), Jenks, Finley, Sayler, Ellis, Morrison, Hewitt (N. Y.) and Springer.

Invincible in Peace; Invisible in War.

The authorship of this aphoristic witticism has generally been attributed to the Hon. Ben Hill, of Georgia, who recently applied it, on the floor of Congress, to the present day. The merit of it belongs to the late Capt. George H. Derby, better known by the nom de plume of "John Phœnix." When stationed at San Francisco he was invited to a public dinner given by a company of State militia. Being called upon for a toast, though a guest, he could not repress his love for satire, and accordingly gave: "The California militia—invincible in peace; invisible in war."

AGRICULTURAL AND DOMESTIC.

Around the Farm.

Keep up Repairs.—When anything about the farm gets out of repair, see to it at once and don't let it remain until it is all gone to pieces. A large expense can be saved to every farmer annually by attention to this.

Value of Manure.—As showing the value of manure in England, a company at Brighton advertises that they will furnish boxes of horse stable manure, each containing fifty-six pounds, at the [illegible] of 60 cents including box and delivery, to [illegible] the article for composts.

Testing Seeds.—One of Mr. Vick's correspondents gives the following as his way of testing seeds: A sod cut from an old pasture is placed, grass up, in a pan or on a board, and boiling water poured on; on this is laid a piece of straw paper, and the seed is sprinkled on this and covered with another paper, then another sod, grass down, well wet with warm water. Keep wet and warm, and in a few days the seed, if good, will sprout.

Spring Care of Strawberry Beds.—Do not be in too much of a hurry to uncover your strawberry beds in the spring. Leave them until the ground is entirely done freezing at night, and until the plants are about ready to begin their season's growth. It is possible that this will make the fruit two or three days later in ripening, but on the other hand the fruit will escape all harm from the late spring frosts. When the covering is removed the ground between the plants should be hoed and a coat of fine manure or ashes applied.

Cure for Stringhalt.—Coleman's Rural World, in discussing the diseases of horses, is responsible for the following which has never before been made public: It is almost universally believed there is no cure for stringhalt. Every veterinary surgeon will say it cannot be cured. But we saw a gentleman in Greene county, Mo., last summer who says he can cure every case. His method is, to go into a stable having a dirt floor in the stall, where the horse stands, and dig a pit about four feet deep under the hind legs of the horse, the fore feet standing as high as formerly. This throws all the weight of the horse on the hind legs. The horse is compelled to stand in this position about half a day, and suffers a great deal of pain, his legs frequently swelling badly. But when taken out of the pit he is cured, and is never known to have stringhalt again.

Roup in Poultry.—The New York Times, in answer to a question for a remedy for roup, gives the following: Take all the sick fowls and put them in a warm, dry, clean place, the floor of which is sprinkled with lime and then with water, in which one ounce of carbolic acid to the gallon of water has been dissolved. Wash the head of each fowl with warm vinegar, and then touch the eyes, throat and nostrils with a feather dipped in a solution of ten grains of carbolic acid in one wineglassful of rain or snow water. Take two ounces of castile soap, half an ounce of hyposulphite of soda, half an ounce of ground ginger, half an ounce of cayenne pepper, and grind the whole together with enough warm water to work it up into a stiff paste. Mix thoroughly together, and divide into pills the size of peas. Give each sick fowl three of these pills twice a day.

Watch the Pigs.—Do not neglect the pigs and leave them to "root hog or die" during the winter. The less rooting they have to do now the better off they will be in the spring. Help them to grow through the winter months, and they will be able to help themselves through the balance of the year. Do not allow them to occupy the same straw for bedding longer than a week at a time; burn up the old leaves and replace them with fresh bedding; this will prevent them from becoming lousy. A bed in an open lot away from a shed of any kind, and where the rays of the sun can reach it, is preferable except in severe weather. It will secure them from the dust that is sure to accumulate in a bed under shelter. Keep them clean and well provided with fresh water and plenty of food, and you will have no occasion to look for a receipt for hog cholera.

About the House.

For Walnut Stains.—The juice of ripe tomatoes will remove the stain of walnuts from the hands without injury to the skin.

To Kill Ants.—A strong solution of carbolic acid and water poured into holes kills all the ants it touches, and the survivors immediately take themselves off.

Catarrh Recipe.—Take one-third pulverized saltpeter and two-thirds pulverized sugar, mix well, and snuff two or three times a day, and it will prove a sure cure.

Chilblain Lotion.—Dissolve one ounce of muriate of ammonia in half a pint of cider vinegar, and apply frequently. One-half pint of alcohol may be added to this lotion with good effect.

Collodion for Freckles.—The following preparation is recommended as being effectual and harmless: One gramme of sulphocarbolate of zinc is reduced to a very fine powder, and then incorporated by trituration with one gramme of essence of lemon (or other flavor); 5 grammes of alcohol and 45 grains of collodion.

Tar-Water as a Dye.—Tar-water may be employed for dyeing silk or wool ashen gray. The stuff is first mordanted with weak perhloride of iron, by soaking in the solution some hours. It is then drained and passed through the bath of tar-water. The oxygenate of iron, which is thus precipitated on the fabric, gives a very solid color.

Remedy for Deafness.—Drop three or four drops of glycerine in the ear before retiring at night; in the morning syringe the ear with warm water, and continue this practice faithfully for some time. The deafness and singing often result from a collection of wax on the tympanum, or drum of the ear, and the glycerine has the effect to loosen it, while the water removes it.

DYING A DOG'S DEATH.

An Exaggerated but Popular Idea of a Case of Hydrophobia.

[From the Cincinnati Commercial.]

Charles P. Wetmore, a young, industrious mechanic, of the firm of Wetmore & Hornbrook, builders, at Hartwell, this county, lies now at No. 67 Hopkins street, the victim of an attack of hydrophobia that seems to have assumed the most positive and terrible shape. Wetmore is an unmarried man, 26 years of age, of large, strong frame and good constitution. His home is at Hartwell, where he boards with Mrs. Alden. On Thursday last he felt very badly, and took a notion that if he could get up a strong perspiration he could better himself. He went skating for that purpose, but the violent exercise and the perspiration resulting did him no good, and he went to bed that night feeling worse. On Friday morning he went down stairs, and, feeling quite thirsty, started to take a drink of water. [illegible] not only could not take the water in his mouth, but that he could not force his hand up to his mouth with the cup. The effort to do this was met by a terrible nervous irritation that he could not overcome. Whether he then suspected what was coming upon him cannot now be told. It is supposed that he did not, for he came into the city to attend to some business. During Friday he frequently felt the pangs of thirst, but could not take water. It was a physical impossibility with him. He had the will power to drink water, he thought, but not the power to get it to his mouth. Feeling very ill, he went to the home of his friend, A. G. Wilson, the young son of Mrs. Wilson, at No. 67 Hopkins street. He had applied to a doctor, who, not comprehending the symptoms, had merely given him a prescription and sent him to bed.

At 1 o'clock on Saturday morning, young Wilson, finding his poor friend in a frenzied and dangerous condition of nervousness, aroused Dr. C. L. Armstrong, of Clark street, just back of them. Dr. Armstrong went round and took charge of the case. Finding it so remarkable a case, he consulted other physicians, who agreed with him that it was a case of hydrophobia in a most positive shape.

Ten or twelve years ago, in his native place, Wetmore was bitten by a dog. Last summer he was again unfortunate in that respect, being bitten four times, three times by one dog and once by another. Mrs. Alden's dog was one of them, and it ran away and never was seen again. The other dog belonged to Mr. Cary, of the firm of Hornbrook & Cary.

It was Dr. Armstrong's opinion that this case must follow the fate of all cases of the kind. Death would be the result of it, and all that medicine could do was to relieve somewhat the horrible sufferings of the victim and the work of those upon whom was imposed the sad and arduous task of watching and holding him. Since the attack of Friday morning Wetmore had been able, once or twice, to speak of having been bitten by a dog. But he appeared to have in his mind only the old bite of ten or twelve years ago, and showed a disposition to conceal the facts about the bites of last summer, although they were well known to his friends. At times when, in his flights, he could command himself enough to collect a few words, he would ask, with an awful horror in his voice and eyes, "You don't think it's that, do you?" and "It can't be that, can it?" And the answer would be, "Oh, no; it can't be that." But the verdict is that it is that, and that there does not seem to be any hope for the life of poor Charles Wetmore. Since Thursday he has tasted no water, and for the last twenty-four hours he has been a tossing, foaming, barking madman.

FRANCE AND GERMANY.

No Love Lost—The German Conqueror Still Threatening France.

[Paris Telegram to the New York Herald.]

Having dismissed the Oriental question for the present with a diplomatic shrug, France exhibits rather a puzzled demeanor just now over the attitude of Germany. There is no love lost between the empire of Wilhelm and the republic of MacMahon at the best of times, but, the revanche fever having almost completely subsided in France, the prospectus for an international exhibition at Paris next year having been issued, and the ablest French statesmen having offered the most solid reasons why France should keep out of all present European quarrels, one would imagine that Germany could rest easy. The fact is, however, that Germany does not reason on these lines. Prince Bismarck was not alarmed at the frantic shrieks of the burning French patriots; for all animals that you are not prepared to kill outright must be allowed to squeal when they are hurt. The cry of the French was the rage of a humbled, defeated and disorganized nation. It did not disturb his ears in Berlin or discompose him over his philosophic pipe and comforting beer in his home at Varzin. He is quick, however, to see that France is rapidly becoming stronger materially than she has been since 1812; that her Government is consolidating and tiding over the most dangerous crisis; that she is rising by her own buoyancy to the surface of European politics.

Bismarck's uneasiness has been manifest in some slightly acid communications with the French Government; but the German press, having no diplomatic reserve to keep, has been pouring forth vitriolic articles upon French presumptions in the tone that a policeman might adopt to a convict out on a ticket-of-leave. Hence the differences between the two Governments continue; for, although France continually pleads "no offense intended," Germany is still finding fresh cause of complaint.

The present fear in Berlin appears to be an alliance between France and Russia. Bismarck wishes to continue holding the Czar in the hollow of his hand and such an alliance with France would look like an attempt on the part of St. Petersburg to choose friends for itself. There is possibly nothing in the story beyond the fact that at the conference the French support of Russian views was very cordial. It suggests that the wily Gortschakoff has taken advantage of the growing importance of France to play for a firmer support from Germany by coquetting with the French republic.

Bismarck consequently proceeds to show France that she is not yet able to run about without his leave, and seeks a quarrel. The extravagant attentions paid to the humbug Gen. Tchernayeff during his stay in Paris exasperate the Germans, and, although it will look a small matter in America to be angry about, it would surprise you to find what trouble it makes here.

TURKEY.

Her Diplomatic Victory Over the "Great Powers."

[From the Chicago Journal.]

That Turkey in her late contest has outwitted and outgeneraled, diplomatically all of her formidable antagonists, intelligent and observant readers of late foreign dispatches cannot doubt. A few months ago Turkey was in open conflict with two of her principal provinces—Servia and Montenegro—who were actively supported by Russian influence and military skill, and, at the same time, resisting, as best she could, the combined advisory attack of all the great powers in Europe. The conflict for a time was of a doubtful character; the odds were fearfully against the success of the crescent. One Sultan after another went down before the storm, and was laid, first upon the political shelf, and then quietly into the grave. But still the crescent waned not. Her arms were victorious, her power survived. Later, a prolonged armistice gave all parties time to gather up their somewhat scattered thoughts, and to gravely consider the situation. Then began the diplomatic battle. The representatives of the "great powers" drew near the Turkish court and capital with heads and mouths full of talk. The talking continued for a month. Proposition was met by counter-proposition, or by refusal. Finally came the ultimatum; and this, after due deliberation, was—flatly rejected. The dignified but vanquished Ambassadors made haste to take their leave of the Sultan, and then submissively withdrew from the bootless encounter.

And what is the general outcome of it all? Turkey remains intact and unhurt, and stands collected and defiant, the real master of the situation, while England has subsided into silence, and Russia, apparently, is not quite ready. Verily, the so-called "sick man" of Europe is not quite so sick after all. His "feebleness" wears very much the semblance of strength. He is either a very willful and reckless invalid, or else he must be "getting better" very rapidly. His answer to the ultimatum, "Death before dishonor," and "No reforms from outside dictation," sound wonderfully like the utterances of a man who knew where he stood and what he was about. In fact, the sick man has achieved a signal diplomatic victory, has shown remarkable pluck and bravery, and acts as though he could do a good deal of damage yet, if necessity compelled him. The European patient must now fairly be pronounced convalescent.

To what is this great change in the aspect of European politics owing? First, as already intimated, the extent of Turkish resources and power, and the strength of Turkish character, have both been underestimated by the "rest of mankind." The Turk is still an ugly and formidable factor in the Eastern problem, and is likely to be for some time to come. He does not, and apparently will not, easily bow down at other men's bidding. Constantinople is a solid quantity on the European map. The Golden Horn is neither brittle nor pointless. Turkey's mongrel, yet united, population is leavened through and through with Mohammedanism, and the probability is that the day will never dawn over the world when Mohammedanism, as a sternly-resisting power in all social and civil life, will not have to be recognised as an existing and an indissoluble reality. All history shows what wonderful tenacity and vitality it possesses.

On the part of Russia, there is the wholesome dread of war. The time has come when monarchs and kingdoms, empires and emperors, and nations, hesitate long before plunging headlong into a seething sea of carnage. Formerly, if national debts accumulated, they could as easily be repudiated; but it is not so now. The national credit is a thing that must not be sacrificed for light or trivial or purely personal and ambitious reasons.

Again, wars are deadly as well as most expensive; and human life has become too precious and valuable to be recklessly thrown away.

And then, underlying all other causes, is the silent potentiality of an ever-growing, ever-extending Christian and humane civilization, which frowns upon an appeal to arms, except as a dernier resort.

UNHAPPY MEXICO.

Interesting News from the Land of Revolutions.

We have news from the City of Mexico, via Havana, to the 6th of February. Diaz had been urged to hasten his return to the capital, as the Government was in danger of falling to pieces, owing to dissensions in the Cabinet.

Business was in a worse condition than ever, and failures were numerous. Some of the foreigners who favored the Diaz revolution had failed, and the new revolution against Diaz was encouraged by the capitalists, who make money by loans to the revolutionists at excessive interest. Escalante loaned Diaz $200,000 toward the payment of $300,000 to the United States with incoming duties as security, receiving $25,000 interest for sixty days.

Bands of robbers were appearing everywhere.

Protestant worship had been suspended at Coahuixtla and Morelos by order of the authorities. The Church party were triumphant in the elections in the capital. The most important positions in Michoacy, Puebla, and Queretaro were held by the Church party. A petition was circulating praying the Government to permit the return of the Sisters of Charity expelled from the country two years ago.

Cortina refuses to obey the order to abandon the Texas frontier. He now opposes Diaz.

Advices from Sonora are that Pesquiera attacked Mariscal's command at Urest. The latter was soon reinforced, and Pesquiera was defeated, with a loss of about thirty killed, many wounded, and fifty prisoners. At last advices a large body of cavalry was pursuing Pesquiera's flying and demoralized forces. It was generally believed that this revolution was thoroughly squelched.

The Indian reservations in Kansas cover 3,467,040 acres.

GRASSHOPPERS.

Their Migration and Destruction of Agricultural Products.

The American Naturalist, in an article detailing the routes of migration and other matters relating to locusts, says:

From the observations already collected, naturalists have adopted the theory that the immediate cause of the migration of the locust from its original breeding place is the unusual abundance of the species during certain years. The locust, like most other insects, increases excessively in dry and warm seasons, and when, for two or more years in succession, such seasons occur, the conditions most favorable for its development are secured. The secondary cause of its migrations is the necessity for food, which, by reason of a superabundance of the species in the places of its origin, is quickly exhausted. After once taking to the wing, the insect is at the mercy of the winds, and is borne in whatever direction they are blowing. The general course of the winds in the Western States and Territories is from the west and northwest during July and August, and accords with the eastward course of the swarms of locusts in those months.

As to the question whether meteorologists can predict the occurrence of seasons of undue heat and drought, and consequently of the increased numbers and migrations of the locust, it is believed that, in the lapse of years, this will be possible. As the result of continued observations, it is also thought that the destination and the time of arrival of the migratory hordes of locusts may be foretold, and the direction of their return flight in the ensuing year. The supposition is now ventured that the June migrations from the eastern limits of the locust-area will be toward the northwest, and the July, August, and early September migrations from the Rocky mountain plateau will be in a general easterly and southerly direction.

In summing up the losses sustained in the United States from the ravages of insects, it is said that "The annual agricultural products of this country, by the last census, amounted in value to $2,500,000,000. Of this amount we in all probability annually lose over $200,000,000 from attacks of injurious insects alone. Dr. Riley avers that their losses during 1874 in Missouri from locusts—and it will be remembered only the western third was invaded—exceeding $15,000,000. This would make the losses in other parts of the West at least twice as much more, or $45,000,000 in all. The estimated money loss occasioned by the chinch-bug in Illinois in 1864 was over $73,000,000; in Missouri in 1874, it is estimated by Dr. Riley to have been $19,000,000. The annual losses from the chinch-bug are greater, Mr. Riley says, than from any other insect. The average annual loss to the cotton crop from the attacks of the cotton army worm alone is estimated at $50,000,000. Adding to these the losses sustained by the attacks of about 1,000 other species of insects which affect our cereals, forage and field crops, fruit trees and shrubs, garden vegetables, shade and ornamental trees, as well as our hard and pine forests, and stored fruits, and it will not be thought an exaggeration to put our annual losses at $200,000,000. If the people of this country would only look at this annual depletion, this absolute waste, which drags her backward in the race with the countries of the Old World, they might see the necessity of taking effectual measures in restraining the ravages of insects. With care and forethought, based on the observance of facts by scientific men, we believe that from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000, or from one-quarter to one-half of this annual waste, could be saved to the country. And the practical, most efficient way is for the States to co-operate with the General Government in the employment of salaried entomologists, who should combine the results of the State officials, and issue weekly, or, if necessary, daily bulletins, perhaps in combination with the Weather-Signal Bureau, as to what enemies should be guarded against, and what preventive and remedial measures should be used."

MIDHAT PASHA'S FALL.

Why the Turkish Prime Minister was Deposed, and Banished from the Country.

The Constantinople correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette telegraphs as follows: "The cause of Midhat Pasha's fall dates from some time back. The imperious character of Midhat Pasha clashed with the firmness of the Sultan, whose liberal views went far ahead of Midhat's. The constitution disappointed the Sultan by the multiplicity of its reserves and qualifications, and many warm discussions occurred between the sovereign and Minister. The Sultan desired to introduce largely a foreign element into the Turkish administration, and especially to employ Englishmen in leading positions in all departments. His Majesty expressed this desire to Midhat Pasha very strongly on several occasions, and last week took him sternly to task for not having acted upon it. Midhat Pasha replied curtly, and wrote subsequently to the Sultan in undeferential terms. On Friday last the Sultan sent for Midhat Pasha, but the summons was not obeyed. On Saturday Midhat Pasha remained home on the plea of indisposition. On Sunday the third summons was disobeyed, but Midhat Pasha attended the council in the afternoon. Meantwhile the police discovered a secret correspondence which showed that Midhat Pasha was plotting for the overthrow of the Sultan and his own nomination as Dictator. On Monday a peremptory summons brought Midhat Pasha to the palace, suspecting nothing. On entering he was arrested and his letters laid before him. There was no gainsaying the evidence against him, and he asked for mercy. A council of Ministers was called, and Midhat Pasha was offered the choice of leaving the country, or being arraigned before a tribunal on the charge of high treason. He elected to leave the country.

"The letters found disclosed that 3,000 Ulemas were to have gone on Monday night to the palace to demand the abdication of the Sultan. The fall of Midhat Pasha will check no reforms, the Sultan being determined to carry out the constitution in its fullest spirit."

Here is another version, given by the Berlin correspondent of the London Times: "Midhat Pasha's fall was occasioned by his refusal to conclude peace with Servia unless Turkey received guarantees. [illegible] was probable in consequence of this resistance, [illegible] the Sultan [illegible] Midhat. Unless the Sultan changes his mind, [illegible] Pasha's administration [illegible] the way for a Cabinet with a decidedly pacific-concession programme."

Women have often successfully hid valuables in their hair, and a young French lady lately found a thousand-franc note in her deceased mother's chignon.

The skeleton of a whale, on exhibition in San Jose, Cal., weighs 6,500 pounds; he weighed, when killed, seventy-five tons. Believed to have been a centenarian.

A correspondent in Montgomery, Va., desires to know the correct pronunciation of the name of Knabe, the piano manufacturer. It is pronounced Ken-ah-by.

Mr. Moody's Chicago harvest has been reckoned up, and it appears that about 2,500 persons have been converted, 8,000 seriously impressed, and hundreds of drunkards been induced to sign the pledge.

All railway employes on the Midland line in England submit to an examination to ascertain whether they are color-blind. A fatal accident recently occurred from a train-man's mistaking the color of a switch-light.

The new breakwater in Buffalo harbor is now 2,715 feet long, and has cost the Government $794,402. Col. Blunt, the engineer in charge, estimates that at least $200,000 could be expended to advantage on this work the coming year.

THE EARLY BIRD AND THE WORM.

Poor foolish worm! if he had lain
Snug in his earthly bed,
That early fowl had never made
A breakfast of his head.
At noon, no doubt, the bird had sought
Some distant forest bough;
And if the worm had slept till then,
He might have lived till now.
Take warning, early risers, all,
And heed the lesson taught;
A worm that lies in bed is safe—
The early worm is caught.

A brutal anti-Chinese bill before the Nevada Legislature proposes to fine a Chinaman $500 for petty larceny, or imprison him for six months, and "in addition to the above punishment the court may, in its discretion, cause the hair of the person or persons so convicted to be clipped within an inch of the scalp, and may direct the Sheriff or constable in attendance on the court to carry the order into effect."

The Chief Queen of Burmah is dead, but she is not buried, nor likely soon to be. Clad in her magnificent robes, with jewels sparkling on every limb, she lies in state in one of the chief rooms of the palace. There she will remain until time completes the slow process of decay, or until a new King ascends the throne, when she will be unceremoniously cast into the garret. The King is in duty bound to await the [illegible].

The Gloucester fishing fleet met with unprecedented losses last year, the aggregate being 27 vessels, valued at $150,000, and 213 men. In 1873, 31 vessels, worth $118,000, and 174 lives were lost. Of the fishermen whose names are on the death list of 1876, 167 went down with their vessels, 21 fell overboard, and 24 were lost in dories; 54 left widows; 112 children were left fatherless. Ten shipwrecks during the December gales closed the horrors of the year.

The Osborne County (Kan.) Farmer says: "We have taken wood, potatoes, corn, eggs, butter, onions, cabbages, chickens, stone, lumber, labor, sand, calico, sourkraut, second-hand clothing, coon-skins and bug-juice on subscriptions, in our time, and now a man writes us to know if we would send the paper six months for an owl. There are few things an editor would refuse on subscription, and if we come across any fellow who is out of owl, and is in need of one, we'll do it."

Among the loungers at the door, says the London World, at a theatrical performance in London the other evening, was the eldest scion of a noble family, who was chatting with some other men well known about town. At this moment Mr. X. appeared, escorting an old lady to her carriage, when suddenly, and out of wantonness, the scion of nobility deliberately threw his gloves in the old lady's face. X. put the lady into her carriage, and then, returning to the doorway, quietly took off the young nobleman's hat and kicked it into the gutter, and asked the owner what he had to say for himself. The young noble laughed off the matter, and admitted he was in the wrong.

It is not only the extremely holy who accompany the religious pilgrimages of France. Among the visitors to the shrine of Genevieve, the patron saint of Paris, were two youths, who have been taken into custody by the police for practices which do not imply fanatical asceticism. They had been observed during the time of the devotions actively engaged in the occupation of relieving the pockets of the faithful of their purchases and handkerchiefs. The young pilgrims confessed that their objects were to secure as much booty as they could in this manner, then to remain in the church after the others had left and break open the collection box into which they had seen a number of valuable coins dropped.

The following is an illustration of the development of English spelling in the Punjaub. It is a verbatim copy of a letter received by a schoolmaster in the north from a householder in his locality: "Cur, ass, you are man of no legs, and I wish to inter my sun in your skull." The obscurity and seeming offensiveness of this address disappear on translation. What was intended to be written was: "Sir, as you are a man of knowledge, I wish to enter my son at your school."

The average indebtedness of the counties of Kansas is $7,120,094.61.

FRUIT HOUSE PRICES.

No dull times with us---Our trade continually on the increase.

No secret about it, simply purchasing our goods in large quantities of first hands and selling direct to our customers at a small profit, thereby saving them the profits of the middle-men which adds 15 to 20 per cent.; even forty per cent on some goods. This saving we are bound to give to our customers.

Take tea for instance: The advance on that article from the time it arrives in New and is sold to the speculator, and from him to the jobber, and from the jobber to the wholesale grocer, and from the wholesale grocer to the retail dealer, is at least 30 per cent. As each of these dealers has to make his 5 to 10 per cent. on the sale, and then the retailer, he must have his profit, and by the time it reaches the consumer there is at least 50 per cent added to it. We cut all these off by ordering direct from the importer and selling direct to the consumer. When we first commenced, our trade was two chests a month and now it is as many chests a day. So with all other goods, Sugars, Coffees, Tobaccoes, Fish, Spice or anything we deal in, we purchase at the first hands and resell direct to the consumer and save the profits of the middle dealers.

THE NEW GOSPEL OF COMPROMISE, ACCORDING TO ST. EDMUN

CHAPTER I.

Now in the last days of Ulysses the tanner there was great tumult in the land of Kohlumbya and in all the coasts thereof.

For all the nations and toungues and people had met together throughout all the land to choose unto them a chief ruler in the stead of Ulysses, and there was a great uproar after the manner of the people of Kohlumbya.

And the Demmicrats—these were they who hated Ulysses and all of his kind—chose Samuel whose surname was Investigator; and the 'Publicans and Cinnahs, who were of the tribe of Krehdit-Mobilyer, chose a man of the tribe of Ohigho, a chief man among his people; and he was called Heighs.

For when any one asked of him concerning anything he would answer only "Hey?" which being interpreted, signifieth "nothing."

Now Samuel was an old man and a just, and he had greatly helped the people of Gotham when they warred against Bihltweed and his army of Robbahs, and had seized Bihltweed and cast him into prison and destroyed his army.

And furthermore Samuel had girded up his loines and gone forth to fight with the giant Kanawlring, which was the greatest of the giants in the country of the Knickabocces, and he had come upon him in a place called Awibahny and had smitten him hip and thigh with great slaughter, whereat the people of Gotham rejoiced and Samuel gat unto himself much glory.

So Samuel prevailed over the giant Kanawlring with a sling and with a stone; and the name of the stone was "Investigashun," wherefor was he called "Investigator."

Now when the people saw what Samuel had done, and when they gazed abroad, even unto Wawshintun, their chief city, and saw how the rulers ruled and how the name of Wawshintun stank in the nostrils of the nations, they said:

Go to! let us choose Samuel for chief ruler, and he will cast out the money changers and those who sell soiled doves from the temple, and he will make us once more a nation and a people before the Lord.

And it was so—that, on the seventh day of the eleventh month, the people came together in all the cities, towns and villages of their possessions over the whole length and bredth of the land and did choose Samuel to be their chif ruler.

So also the 'Publicans and Cinnahs and the Kahpat-Baggahs (which were a race of thieves) and the Skahlewaggs (which were worse than the Kahpat-Baggahs,) did meet together and did choose "Heighs" to be chief ruler.

For they said, "He is a safe man; he saith only 'Hey?' and he will protect us and our robberies."

But when the people were numbered it was found that Samuel and his people were more than Heighs and his people.

Wherefor great fear fell upon the Publicans and Cinnahs, for they had got great gain under Ulysses, and they trembled greatly lest Samuel would cast them forth into outer darkness, where should be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth.

CHAPTER II.

Now about this time it came to pass that certain of the Cinnahs and Skahlewaggs met togather in the city of Philadelphia, at the house which is called "Gihrahd" and at the house which is called "Kohnteen-ental," and they communed togather in an upper-room.

And certain of them, men of Belial who feared not God, neither regarded man, did compass about how they should smite Samuel and his people and get unto themselves the spoils of the land.

And one who was great among them answered and said: Lo! here is Zachariah, who is surnamed Baibee-Cmauscher, he will help us. Go to, then, let us agree togather and let us send couriers to the country of the Kohnfedrits, and let us devise a sign—even the bloody undergarment—whereby they may be known unto our people, and let us say unto our friends, the Skahlewaggs and the Niggahs and the Kahpat-Baggahs, that they assemble togather in Karoligna, which lieth to the southward, and in Phlawerda, and in Loocesahnah and that they take counsel togather how we may defeat Samuel and all his hosts, for verily we are but as dead men if he cometh into power.

And another aswered and said: The words are good, for what shall it profit us when Samuel cometh in and bringeth to light our inmost and secret doing? Verily the people will stone us, or put us unto the torture of the Tah-an-fethah! And we shall loose our gains which we have made.

And these sayings seemed good unto the Cinnahs, and they wrote letters unto Zachariah, surnamed Biabee-Cmauscher, and sent messengers unto the Niggahs and the Skahlewaggs and the Kahpat-Baggahs and the conspiracy was strong.

And Zachariah girded up his loins and went forth as a roaring lion, and he called unto him William the Little, who was of the lawyers; and they sent letters unto the captains of the Robbahs in Karoligna, which lieth to the southward, and in Phlawreda and in Looceseahnah, saying: "Now when this letter cometh unto you go ye forth into the cities and assemble together the Robbahs, and take counsel together what ye shall do, for it is not meet that Samuel and his friends should rejoice over us. Have ye not with you the monster called Rehturnin Bawd? him that hath many heads and taketh daily many horns? Go to, then, commune ye with him, and Ulysses will save you from the people with armed men, as many as ye wish, that draw sword."

Now there were in those countries—even in Karoligna that lieth to the southward, and in Phlawreda and Looceseshnah—monsters called Rehturnin Bawds which had many heads and took daily many hornes, and they sorely vexed the people ten years. And these were they whom the Robbahs and the Niggahs and the Kahpat-Baggahs called unto their aid.

And in Looceseahnah this monster had four heads, two white and two black, and the fifth head had been cut off and had not grown out again.

And the name of the first head was Mahde-sun-wels, which is, being interpreted, "change of votes," and the next unto it was called Andashsun, and Kennah and Kassanknave were Niggahs.

And these four met together in Guuawrleens, the chief city of Looceseahnah and received and heard the voices of the people, and behold they were for Samuel.

But Mahde-sun-wels went with his disciples into an inner chamber, and did count, and lo! when they came forth and spake again of the voices of the people they were for Heighs

For of a verity, Mahde-sun-wels was not called "changer of votes" without reason.

Likewise did the Rehturnin Bawds do in Karoligna, which lieth to the southward, and in Phlawreda, and they declared that the people of the land of Kolumbya had chosen Heighs for their chief ruler.

Then were Zachariah and the rest of the Cinnahs glad, and they sent messengers from Main even unto Tecksass, saying unto their servants and those that bore rule under Ulysses that they should cry aloud for Heighs and spare not money.

And this was a sign unto them—the under-raiment of a man dipped in the blood of goats which should be continually waved before the people.

And the servants of Zachariah did so, and all of the 'Publicans and Cinnahs were glad, and rejoiced thereat exceedingly.

Howbeit there were some of the 'Publicans which were not Cinnahs, and these were grieved in their hearts. But they feared the Kaw-Kuss which was the puishment of those who opposed the Cinnahs in those days.

CHAPTER III.

Now these are they who consorted together to anoint Heighs instead of Samuel. Zachariah, called Baibee Cmauscher, he was the chief, and he had a familiar spirit called Dehmmeigeon.

And next unto him was Oliver, whose surname was Bluddeeshurt. He it was who continually stirred up the Cinnahs, (for he was chief among them.) Likewise he was called by the Demmicrats "Devilontusticks," which is, being interpreted, "Man-afraid-of-his-Legs."

And John, the brother of Teh-kum-see, was next unto him. (Now Teh-kum-see was captain of the hosts of Kohlumbya, but he was not like unto John.)

He was a son of Belial, and did many evil things, and he consorted with Zachariah and with Oliver and with Ulysses and their fellows, and many years he sorely vexed the people.

He also was of the tribe of Ohigho, and he was exceeding high, though he attained not the hight of Mahde-sun-wels.

And the rest of the conspirators James the priest was chief. His surname was Garfield, and he was a mighty man of valor, and had slain many with his chief weapon, which was called "Tung" And he had also another weapon called "cheak," with which he defeated his enemies.

And John, whose surname was Caisson, he also was a mighty man and a valiant waver of the bloody garment. He was great among his people, yet he attained not unto the first three.

And Ujean was next unto him. He is chief among the Smawlfri which were many among the 'Publicans. Likewise there were many Niggahs among the Smawlfri.

These all met togather and took counsel how they should anoint Heighs instead of Samuel to be chief ruler; and their plans prospered. Likewise also they asked counsel of the familiar spirit of Zachariah, even of Dehmmeigeon, and he helped them.

CHAPTER IV.

Now there was a man in the city of Washintun who was called Donpyhat, but Zachariah called him "Die-on pot," which signifieth "Hammer-and-tongs;" and he was of the race of the Scribes.

Now Donpyhat saw, and behold, the 'Publicans and Cinnahs did conspire against Samuel, and the conspiracy was strong.

Therefore he sent and called unto his brethren of the Scribes, which were Bewhel and What-a-son and Chawles, whose surname was Deighnan, and many others. And when they were come together he said to them:

Lift up now your eyes and look, and behold the Cinnahs and the Rabbahs and the Kahpat Baggahs and the Skhlewags do conspire against Samuel. Therefore let us grid our lions and go forth and fight against them, that the people be not deceived.

And the thing that Donpyhat said pleased the brethren; and they sent forth messengers throughout the land warning the people of the evil doings of Zachariah and Oliver and their brethren.

And the messengers were called noospapahs, and they went everywhere over the whole breadth of the land, even from the lakes of Maine unto the river Grandee, which lieth upon the southwest border of Tecksass, as thou goest up toward Mejico. There was no tongue nor people nor nation where their voice was not heard.

And the people were stirred up, and girded on every man his armor, and said lo! we will go forth to battle against Zachariah and against Kahpat-Baggahs and the Skhalewaggs, and we will smite them, from Washintun, the chief city, even unto Karoligna, which lieth to the southward, and unto Looceseahnah; and we will anoint Samuel, whom we did choose to be chief ruler, and not Heighs, whom we did not choose.

And What-a-son, he called togather many of the princes and the people in the chief city, which is Wawshintun, and spake unto them, saying:

Speak unto your brethern in the North and in the East and in the West, that they send off their chief men five score thousand unto this city, even Washintun, that they may strengthen the hands of the princes of our people when they come together in the third month to number the people of Samuel and the people of Heighs.

And these sayings were told unto Uysses, and he sent unto his captains of hundreds and captains of fifties and tens, and did bring armed men of the host into the city, even the chief city Washintun, that they might strengthen the hands of Zachariah and of William the Little, and of Oliver and of all the Cinnahs.

But the people were angry and did ponder these things in their hearts.

Figures are what is wanted

Not election majorities, but such as interest the great army of American producers. Twenty-five years ago the eight counties of Missouri, now traversed by the Old Reliable Hanibal & St. Joseph Railroad were nearly a wilderness. To-day, by a late census, it is discovered that these counties produce over one-fourteenth of the entire wheat crop of the entire State, over one-twelfth of the corn crop, and over one-ninth of the oats. The same growth of country is now being repeated in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and New Mexico, and the immortal Greeley had this identical route and section of country in mind when he breath those stirring words of wisdom, "Young man, go West." Therefore, it is but naturla that parties taking this advice should desire to pass over a road that has done so much for a great State, (especially as it offers the best facilities) and see for themselves. By the Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad, through cars are run from Cleveland and Toledo, and thro' connections made from Cincinnati and Indianapolis, via Quincy, to St. Jo., Atchison and Kansas City, and from Chicago to Kansas City without change. We are about to issue, in connection with our own, a county map of Colorado and New Mexico, giving valuable information as regards time tables, routes, distances, altitudes, &c., which we will be pleased to furnish free, upon application in person or by letter addressed to Alive in an Air-Tight Coffin.

From the Omaha Herald.

The body of a man who went to California to regain health, was recently shipped in a metallic coffin for his former home in the East. When the Central Pacific train arrived at Ogden Junction the corpse was consigned to the Union Pacific Company and placed under charge of express manager Frank Burgess. While the train was in the western part of Nebraska, Mr Burgess heard sounds from the coffin that led him to believe that the dead man had came to life. It was in the night, and he heard the sounds as he lay dozing and half asleep. Again the noise was heard and the attention of the messenger was rivited to the coffin, and the horrible possibility that the dead might be alive thrust itself upon the messenger so farcibly that he called the attention of other employees to it, but after listening a moment, they merely laughed at him. The convictions of the express manager, however, were so strong that he heard moans from the coffin, that he had the case opened when the train made its next halt. The weather was very cold, and upon the inside of the glass plate of the coffien there had accumulated a thin film of frost, such as might have been deposited by the breath of a person confined in such narrow quarters. The face was almost drawn up against the class plate, and other disturbances indicated life. While Burgess had no doubt that the man, though dead then, had been alive in the coffin, the other employees explained the accumulation of frost on the glass as the natural exhalations of the dead body, and the disturbance of the corpse as due to the movements in the shipping.

A private dispatch, received from Chicago, says that when the coffin arrived at its destination and was opened, unmistakable proofs of the terrible truth were discovered. The hands were clinched, the lips bitten, the mouth filled with bloody froth The man had been alive, and it was his moaning that had been heard, but not recognized.

THE NEWS CONDENSED.

THE EAST.

WILLIAM STEEBE & Co., lace importers, of New York, have been victimized by robbers to the tune of $60,000. Their store was entered at night, and fine French laces to that value carted away. It is one of the heaviest burglaries ever perpetrated in that city.... Another cargo of war material for Turkey has just been shipped from New Haven, Conn. It consisted of 10,000,000 Snider cartridges, 400,000 Winchester cartridges, 5,000,000 [illegible] shells, 5,000,000 bullets, 25,000 Martini guns, and 25,000 Martini scabbards, all contained in 18,317 cases, the total value being $1,048,600.... The banking house of King & Son, in William street, New York, was robbed, a few days ago, of $180,000 worth of United States bonds, mortgages, securities, etc.... The Brooklyn Argus and Union have been consolidated, under the name of the Union-Argus.... Sag Harbor, Long Island, has been visited by a destructive conflagration, involving the loss of $150,000 worth of property.

THE WEST.

THE good city of Minneapolis, Minn., has been the scene of a tragedy combining all the essentials of a first-class sensation. Wm. H. Sidle, assistant cashier of a bank of which his father is President, and a young man occupying a prominent position in business and social circles, was quietly walking along the street, when he was shot down by a woman named Kate Noonan. It appears that Sidle had been criminally intimate with the woman, and had discarded and refused to recognize her. This so angered her that she sought revenge in the manner mentioned.

ABOUT 1,000 feet of the eastern approach of the St. Louis railroad bridge has been destroyed by fire, causing a temporary suspension of travel over the structure. The loss is estimated at about $150,000.... Col. Fred Meyer, Internal Revenue Supervisor, and Nathaniel C. Dryden, a prominent Missouri lawyer, recently engaged in a little pistol-practice at Warrenton, Mo., Meyer being shot in the mouth and dangerously wounded. The altercation was the outgrowth of a lawsuit about some crooked stills seized by Meyer. At last accounts Col. Meyer was lying at the point of death.

IT is reported that silver has been discovered a few miles south of Rushford, Minn. Every one in that neighborhood is in a highly-excited state. Specimens have been sent to Philadelphia for assay.... D. Kreigh & Co., of Chicago, heavy dealers in grain and provisions, have failed. Their liabilities will reach several hundred thousand dollars.

THE Ohio State Grange has just held its annual session at Cincinnati. Two hundred delegates were present, representing every county in the State. The report of the State Business Agent shows an aggregate business of over $3,000,000, making a showing of $800,000 to Patrons. The sales of hogs during the past season amounted to $1,000,000, saving commission to owners and giving them the advantage of a good market.

THE boiler of the Clifton Nail-Keg Factory, at Middleport, Ohio, exploded with a terrible effect a few days ago. The large building was completely wrecked, and four of the workmen killed and about a dozen wounded.... The wool-growers of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania held a meeting at Cincinnati last week, and decided to erect a capacious storehouse at Steubenville, O., for the purpose of storing their product and assorting it before placing it upon the market. They will dispose of their stock directly to manufacturers.

THE SOUTH.

THE Galveston, Harrisburg and San Antonio railroad is now completed. The completion of this road opens up a large portion of the finest territory in Western Texas, which has heretofore been without railroad communication.

POLITICAL.

DUNCAN F. KENNER, of New Orleans, the man whom J. Madison Wells, of the Louisiana Returning Board, testified offered him (Wells) $200,000 to declare the result of the election in that State for Tilden, was before the House prerogative committee last week. His testimony was to the effect that Wells and he had several secret interviews, at which the sale of the vote of Louisiana was the subject of deliberation; that Wells was anxious to enter into negotiations, but wanted a "big pile" for the job, intimating that about a million dollars would be the proper figure, as Anderson himself wanted half a million. The witness said this was perfectly ridiculous, and, if the demand was insisted upon, they might as well drop matters. After the promulgation of the vote they met, and witness expressed his astonishment and regret at Wells' course. Wells said, "What could I do? You had no money." Witness said he hoped Wells had made himself safe, and Wells replied, "You bet," or words to that effect. The money, the witness said, was to be raised by subscription, he himself proposing to give $5,000.

WILLIAM S. STOKLEY, Republican, has been re-elected Mayor of Philadelphia by 3,000 majority. In Pittsburgh and Lancaster the Democrats elect the Mayor and other municipal officers.

THE following letter from Gov. Tilden explains itself:

NEW YORK, Feb. 21.

To Hon. Francis Kernan, Washington:

A telegram to the Associated Press, published this morning, states that a harmonious agreement has been brought about between the Senate committee, of which you are a member, and the committee of the House, by which it has been decided not to go into an examination of my bank account on the one hand, or accounts of the Chairman of the Republican committee on the other hand. I repudiate any such agreement, and disclaim any such immunity, protection, or benefit from it. I reject utterly the false imputation that my private bank account contains anything whatever that needs to be concealed. Under the pretense of looking for a payment in December, demand was made for all payments after May and all deposits during nine months. The bank was repeatedly menaced with removal of its officers and books to Washington. A transcript of entries of private business, trusts, charities, containing everything but what the committee was commissioned to investigate, but nothing which it was commissioned to investigate, because nothing of that sort existed, has been taken, with my knowledge, to Washington. Of course, there is no item in it relating to anything in Oregon, for I never made, authorized, or knew of any expenditure in relation to the election in that State, or the resulting controversies, or any promise or obligation or negotiation on the subject. Mr. Ellis, acting President of the bank, himself a Republican, some time ago told the Chairman of the committee and several of its members that there is nothing in the account capable of furthering any just object of investigation. I am also informed that a resolution was passed to summon me as a witness, but have received no subpœna. I had written before this telegram appeared requesting you to say to the committee that it would be more agreeable to me not to visit Washington if the committee would send a sub-committee or hold a session here, but that otherwise I should attend under the subpœna. As to this arrangement now reported, I have only to say that I can accept the decorum and decency, but not a fictitious equivalent for a mantle of secrecy to anybody else.

S. J. TILDEN.

THE State Prohibition Convention of Ohio met at Columbus, last week, and nominated the following ticket: For Governor, H. A. Thompson; Lieutenant Governor, George R. Jenkins; State Treasurer, Arza Alderman; Attorney General, D. W. Gage; Supreme Judge, D. C. Montgomery; Clerk of the Supreme Court, George Dodd; Member of the Board of Public Works, Amos Miller.

THE Cabinet-makers are busily at work constructing a council of ministers for the incoming President. The Washington correspondent of the Chicago Tribune telegraphs as follows: "There is substantial unanimity that the Cabinet, as a New England Senator says, 'will not be a Cabinet of scrubs and noboddies.' It is believed that no member of the present Cabinet will remain permanently, but it is expected that Gov. Hayes will request them to stay until the 14th of March. One Cabinet position at least will be given to a Southern moderate man of Whig antecedents who has not been identified with the Republican party, in order to try the experiment of breaking up the color-line and dividing the white vote South. Evarts is accorded the State Department on all hands, notwithstanding the inevitable opposition of Conkling. The Postoffice Department and Interior speculation gives to the South. John Sherman, it is said, may be made Secretary of the Treasury. The War Department, it is calculated, will go to a Northern man of good war record. Gen. Logan's friends will urge him. Gen. Harrison, of Indiana, and Gen. Hawley, of Connecticut, are mentioned to reconcile the Cameron element to the inevitable failure of Don Cameron to retain a position in the Cabinet. It is suggested that Wayne McVeigh may be made Attorney General. He is a son-in-law of Senator Cameron."

GENERAL.

AN interesting test has just been made on the stage of McVicker's Theater, Chicago, of a newly-invented fire-proof preparation for stage scenery and properties. The test, which was made in the presence of a number of city officials, was every way satisfactory. The canvas, as it came from the store, blazed instantly when ignited and burned freely; but, after being coated with the preparation, the canvas would only char under a three-quarter inch blow-pipe of gas, would not even ignite at the ordinary application of fire, and would not blaze under any circumstances. Pieces of wood of the thickness of the frame-work used for scenes and scene-shifting, which had also been coated with fire-paint, were but slightly charred under a blaze of gas for as much as five minutes. This valuable preparation is destined to be utilized not alone by theater people, but will be found of incalculable benefit to the public at large, and farmers in particular. By applying it to barns and other outbuildings, these structures can be rendered almost absolutely fire-proof, and a safeguard will thus be afforded against the occurrence of accidental and incendiary fires, to which our agricultural friends are so constantly subject. The preparation consists of a combination of silicate, tungstate of soda and whiting. Full particulars as to how to make and apply this cheap, invaluable precaution against fire will be furnished cheerfully, and free of charge, on application to Mr. L. L. Sharpe, the business manager of McVicker's Theater, Chicago.

RECENT deaths: Judge H. W. Williams, of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. Judge Robert Flint, the oldest member of the Fond du Lac (Wis.) bar.

A HORRIBLE story of suffering, starvation and cannibalism at sea is related in a letter received at Boston from Capt. Kane, of the schooner F. E. McDonald, dated on the west coast of Africa. Capt. Kane relates that on his outward voyage from Boston he fell in with the wreck of the British bark Marie, having on board two survivors of the crew of fourteen men, the others having perished from exposure and famine. The two men were taken on board the schooner, but one died within four hours. From the sole survivor it was ascertained that the bark was bound from Doboy, Ga., to Belfast, Ireland; that she sprung aleak in a gale and filled with water so it was impossible to save any provisions or fresh water. They soon began to die of starvation, and as soon as one died the rest subsisted upon the dead body, and so on, until only two were left. The survivor, James McLaughlin, belongs to Belfast, Ireland, and says that only small portions of the bodies could be eaten. No one was killed, but the moment one died the survivors cut the throat of deceased and drank the blood, and then divided the heart and brains. It was thirty-two days from the time of the disaster until the wreck was sighted, and during all this time the crew had not a drop of water or other food than the bodies of their dead shipmates.

WASHINGTON.

THE Acting Secretary of the Treasury has issued instructions under which any depository bank located in any city in which there is no independent treasury office, by transmitting to the Treasurer of the United States a certificate stating that the sum of $1,000 has been placed to his credit in the general account, will receive direct from some mint of the United States, free of expense, a like amount of subsidiary silver coin.... Winslow, indicted for the larceny of the $12,000 package from the Treasury Department, has been sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment in the Albany Penitentiary.... It is understood that the Army Board, of which Gen. Schofield is President, has reported new regulations for the army, the result of which is to make the heads of bureaus of the War Department in Washington staff-officers to the General of the Army.... The President last week approved the act of Congress providing for a deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding. The bill contains a provision that compositors in the Government Printing Office shall hereafter receive only 50 cents per 1,000 ems for setting type. This provision has caused considerable excitement among those employed in the Government Printing Office, and several delegations waited upon the President urging him to veto the bill.

A WASHINGTON dispatch to the Chicago Tribune says: "President Grant, in speaking of the political status of South Carolina and Louisiana, said that the cases were extremely dissimilar, and could hardly be treated under one general line of action. In South Carolina the contest had assumed such a phase that the whole army of the United States would be inadequate to enforce the authority of Gov. Chamberlain; that the people of the State had resolved to resort to violence, but adopted a mode of resistance much more effective than armed demonstration. They had refused to pay their State taxes, and it would be useless to sell their property, as no one would buy it. Unless Chamberlain could compel the collection of taxes, it would be utterly useless for him to expect to maintain his authority for any length of time. This state of affairs must inevitably result in the abandonment of all efforts by Chamberlain to maintain himself in the exercise of the gubernatorial functions of South Carolina. In regard to Louisiana the President will not undertake to decide as between Messrs. Packard and Nicholls."

THE Washington Capital of Sunday, Feb. 18, contained a fiery article upon the decision of the Electoral Tribunal, in which the following passage occurred: "If a man thus returned to power can ride in safety from the Executive Mansion to the Capitol to be inaugurated, we are fitted for the slavery that will follow the inauguration. We do not believe the people of the United States are of this servile sort. We do not believe that they are prepared, without a blow, to part with their hard-earned, blood-stained possessions. Notice is now served on the citizens of Louisiana and South Carolina that they must care for themselves. How soon lamp-posts will bear fruit is for them to say. To the people of the North and West notice is given that bondholders and monopolies may fatten securely. That a shrinkage of values is now in order. If there is law for fraud, there is reason for violence, and to that we make our last appeal." The appearance of this article was the subject of a Cabinet meeting the following day, at which it was determined to prosecute Don Piatt, the editor of the Capital, for sedition, and libel upon the President.

TWO REAR ADMIRALS in the United States Navy—Goldsborough and Davis—died at Washington last week.

THE Secretary of the Treasury has decided that until Congress amends the Pacific Railroad laws, or enacts further legislation, he has no option but to apply the whole amount of the earnings for mail transportation of the several Pacific railroads and their branches to the liquidation of the interest account of these roads, notwithstanding the Supreme Court has decided that these roads are entitled to one-half of such earnings.... In obedience to a call from the Election Committee of the Senate, the Secretary of the State of Louisiana has delivered to that committee the returns from the twenty-two challenged parishes of Louisiana.

EMPEROR WILLIAM, in opening the German Parliament, the other day, expressed the opinion that the peace of Europe will not be broken in consequence of the Eastern complications, basing that opinion upon the belief that the united demands of the powers upon Turkey for guarantees of reform will be complied with by the Porte, and war thus averted. His Majesty, however, took occasion to add the significant remark that his Government will continue to exercise its influence in behalf of the Christians in Turkey, and of the preservation of the peace of Europe, but, "above all things, strengthening its own good relations with the Governments allied or otherwise friendly to it." .... Turkey has ordered a large number of revolvers from the United States.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

House Debate on the Question of Sustaining the Electoral Commission's Decision in the Louisiana Case.

Mr. Gibson offered an order that the Hayes electoral votes for Louisiana be not counted.

Mr. Hurlbut moved to amend by striking out the word "not."

The discussion was opened by Mr. New, who said that he had voted for the Electoral Commission bill without hesitation or misgiving, and he was not ashamed of the support which he had given to that measure. He accepted, without qualification his humble share of responsibility. He would vote to sustain the objections to the decision of the commission. He was in favor of proceeding without unnecessary delay to the completion of the count.

Mr. Seelye said that in the case of the Louisiana election, the corruption on one side seemed as heinous as the cruelty on the other side was horrible. He found it quite impossible to say which of the two sets of electors from Louisiana voiced the true will of the people of that State. It would have been hard to find wiser and more candid men than those who had pronounced the decision of the Electoral Commission. He appreciated the strength of their position. Congress could not be too jealous of the constitutional right of the State to choose its electors.

Mr. Joyce declared that the whole scheme of the election to the Presidency of the grand fraud of Gramercy park had been a superb Democratic cheat from beginning to end.

Mr. Rice protested against the wrong and violence embodied in the decision, and argued that the whole subject should be referred back to the commission.

Mr. Watterson rose to speak, and immediately the floor and galleries were hushed into stillness. He said if the acceptance of the inevitable with resolution and dignity be the highest, as it is the rarest form of courage known among men, it is made harder in this present instance by the consciousness of double-dealing and foul play. Two courses are open to the majority on this floor—on the one hand, passionate outcry, at once impotent and childish; on the other hand, without offering needless obstruction to the progress of events, an earnest, manly, but temperate protest against what we believe to be great and grievous wrong. In my judgment the latter is our clear and bounden duty. We owe it to the necessities of the case; we owe it to the country; we owe it to ourselves. Because we were duped by false pretenses into the snare furnished, it is no reason why we should forget the obligations that press upon honorable men. In the very act of passing the Electoral Commission bill we provided for the contingency that has come upon us. I voted for that measure in perfect good faith. The result is against me, and, detestable as I must think the means that brought it about, I accept it as a finality. I shall go to my constituents and shall tell them all, for, as now advised, they know only a part, and, when they have taken time for reflection, they will, I am very sure, illustrate the wisdom and grace of moderation, doing nothing that does not become good citizens. Life will still go forward, in spite of all this. There are many things to live for yet in this rough world, and, among the rest, that day of reckoning—"Dies iræ dies illa"—when the dark shall be light, and the wrong be made right.

Mr. Danford, of Ohio, defended the decision as one which, outside of party feeling, would meet the approval of the whole American people. Although there had been investigating committees into the elections in Florida, Louisiana and Oregon, which had found much crookedness, yet in all words spoken, letters written, telegrams sent, there had not been traced to the President-elect, or to any member of his household, one word that would bring the blush of shame to the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. Ellis, of Louisiana, said: Louisiana, by the voice of 10,000 majority of her people, voted for Samuel J. Tilden for President, but I find to-day by the voice of this commission her electoral vote cast for one Hayes. In arriving at that decision, in overthrowing the will of the people of Louisiana, that commission decided in the first place that they would not examine into the unconstitutionality of the law creating this Returning Board. In the second place, it refused to go into the question of fraud, and in the third place, having sworn to decide according to the constitution of the United States, they, the chosen ministers and high priests of that constitution, sat and closed their ears against the expressed voice and will of that constitution, against any proof as to the ineligibility of two of these electors, well known, undisputed and undoubted. The Returning Board violated the Election law, and no lawyer has ever doubted it. No lawyer will ever dispute it. It is a principle of law familiar to every neophyte in the profession that whatever is done in opposition to the declared will of the people through their constitution is an absolute nullity. But again, sir, they refused to hear any proof of fraud. Fraud—it obliterates, it vitiates everything. It unclasps the clutches of the most skillfully drawn mortgage act around real estate. It vitiates even the sanctity of the marriage tie, and yet this great Government, which was able to summon 3,000,000 in its defense, which was able to shake the world by the earthquake of its agony and struggle for self-preservation, must fall hopelessly paralyzed before the fraud conveyed to it by four men whose acts are black with crime, whose souls are seared with perjury—aye, blacker than Judas Iscariot, and whom it were base flattery to call men. As to the eligibility of these electors under the constitution, these Commissioners who had sworn to decide according to the constitution, as I said before, sat there, these high priests, these chosen ministers, with the sword which is held by this House and by the Senate placed in their hands to guard the constitution, and to guard this Government against the illegal vote of this Electoral College, yet they sat there and refused to hear the most positive and convincing testimony of the ineligibility of two of those electors. Sir, the deed is done. The crime is accomplished. For four years from the 4th of March next the Republican party will hold the shadow of executive power. I say the shadow, because the substance of usurped power is over and can never be realized. The immortal pencil of Gustave Dore has illustrated the legend of the wandering Jew. You have all seen it. In all that dreary march of years he found no rest, no resting-place from his crime and its memories. Whether amid the busy haunts of men or in the dim aisles of the forest, whether upon the mountain top or amid the roar and spray of the ocean storm, there was ever the memory of the crime of the Jew, the pale, suffering face of the Redeemer, and the accusing voice forever in his ear. So it must be with the Republican party and the unjust [illegible] of this consummation. The spoils of office will not [illegible]. The splendors of the Presidential receptions and levees cannot banish its presence. The silence and gravity of the Cabinet meetings will not banish or hush its accusing voice, and in four years more this great American people, this wronged, outraged people, will rise in their majesty and will hurl these dishonest guests of the feast from power everywhere, and brand with the indelible brand of infamy those men who have aided, countenanced, abetted, and defended this monstrous crime.

Mr. Foster, of Ohio, who represents the district in which Gov. Hayes resides, spoke of the duty of both parties to abide by the decision of the Electoral Commission, and said this is not a time for mere party exultation. The exultation of the patriot over the nation's escape from the dangers that threatened its peace, prosperity, and happiness is fitting and proper. In the triumph of peace over disorder and possible civil war, both parties can unite in exultation. While I do not rejoice simply in a party sense, I do rejoice that one of the purest and most patriotic of our fellow-citizens is to guide the affairs of this Government for the four years to come. Representing as I do the district in which Gov. Hayes resides, and being a lifelong acquaintance of his, I but speak the opinion of all persons who know him when I say that his administration will be wise, patriotic and just, notwithstanding whatever may be said to the contrary here or elsewhere. The people of the country may confidently expect from him not only a fair, but a generous, consideration. His letter of acceptance is the expression of a man of the broadest and loftiest patriotism. I feel certain that I shall be sustained by his acts when I say that his highest ambition will be to administer the Government so patriotically and wisely as to wipe away every necessity or excuse for the formation of parties on a sectional basis, and all traces of party color lines; that thereafter and forever we shall hear no more of a solid South or a united North. The flag shall float over States, not provinces; over freemen, not subjects. When Gov. Hayes appealed to the people of the South in his letter of acceptance, he addressed them as "My countrymen," and why not his countrymen? Are not the Southern States the equal of those of the North, East or West, and is not the South an integral part of the nation? It has been said sneeringly, and for the purpose of stirring the wild passions of the human heart to bad actions, that the South, under President Hayes, must submit to an unconditional surrender to the Republican party. No, sir; no such demand will be made. All that will be expected is patriotic co-operation of the Southern patriots in the great work of restoration through the Union, the Constitution, and enforcement of the laws. In this great work the representative men of the South have already distinguished themselves for patriotism and statesmanship during the pendency of this present crisis in our history.

Mr. Sparks, of Illinois, in reply to Mr. Foster, said that he doubted the patriotism of any man who took an office thrust upon him by fraud, and which he knew he got through fraud. He imagined "the little gentleman from Grammercy Park" paying a visit to Hayes at the White House, and saying, as he took up his hat to leave, "Sir, a quarter of a million of people voted for me more than voted for you, and a clearly-defined majority of the electoral vote of the country was for me, but through your rascally, scoundrelly, fraudulent Returning Boards you have stolen the office from me."

Regular Proceedings.

FRIDAY, Feb. 16.—SENATE.—The Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was passed, after which the Senate devoted the day to consideration of the bill for the liquidation of the indebtedness of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

HOUSE.—The proceedings were exceedingly dull and uninteresting, and hardly worth chronicling.

SATURDAY, Feb. 17.—SENATE.—Mr. Kelly made a personal explanation touching his action in the Oregon electoral muddle. He said he did sign the cipher dispatch for Mr. Patrick, who represented that it was a telegram to W. T. Pelton for $10,000 to pay lawyers' fees in Oregon, and if not used would be returned. He denied he ever attempted to buy a Republican elector, or that he ever authorized any one to make such an offer for him. Mr. Kelly also read a telegram from Gov. Grover, of Oregon, denying the authorship of the cipher telegram to Gov. Tilden, signed "Gobble," and saying that he never sent a cipher dispatch in his life. Mr. Sargent said he thought the Senator from Oregon did right to endeavor to free his name from the nefarious transactions in Oregon. The country had lived through the centennial without any Presidential elector betraying the party which elected him, but it had not lived through the centennial without seeing an attempt to buy an elector sanctioned by the chief of a great political party. Mr. Bogy said he condemned fraud in Oregon or anywhere else, and he was not willing to sit in his place and permit a stigma of the kind charged by the Senator from California (Sargent) to rest upon the Democratic party as the only party guilty of fraud. The country knew there were frauds in Florida and Louisiana, perpetrated by the Republican party, and it knew how these frauds resulted. These frauds were like whited sepulchres, fair without, but foul as hell within. Mr. Bogy severely criticised the course of Justice Bradley for taking one position in the case of Florida, and then, as he charged, reversing it in the Louisiana case, declaring that his name "will go down to after ages disgraced. His name will be associated with Marlborough and Jeffreys, and will never be pronounced without a hiss from all good men in this country." Mr. Morton said he had heard with regret the remarks made by the Senator from Missouri in regard to Justice Bradley. If that Senator could have heard the discussions of the Electoral Commission as he (Morton) heard them, he would not have made such remarks. The time would come when the opinions of members of the commission would be published, and he was sure the Senator would then see he had done an act of injustice to an able and conscientious Judge.... The discussion was further continued till adjournment, by Messrs. Sargent, Cooper, and Jones, of Florida.

HOUSE.—The Speaker laid before the House a communication from Justice Clifford, President of the Electoral Commission, informing the House that the commission had arrived at a decision in the Louisiana case, and had transmitted its decision to the President of the Senate, to be opened and read in the presence of the two houses.... A message was received from the Senate announcing that that body was ready to meet the House in joint convention, and proceed with the counting of the electoral votes.... A resolution was introduced, by Mr. Lamar, directing the Clerk of the House to inform the Senate it would be ready to receive that body at 11 o'clock on Monday, Feb. 19, for the purpose of proceeding with the counting of the electoral votes. Adopted—152 to 111.

MONDAY, Feb. 19.—SENATE.—At 10:50 a. m. the Senate repaired to the House, headed by its officers. Upon returning, the President pro tem. said that objection having been made to the decision on the vote of Louisiana, the two houses separated to deliberate in regard to that decision, and, unless some Senator asked it, he would not direct the decision and objections thereto read again. The objections were then read. Mr. Sherman submitted a resolution that the decision of the commission stand as the judgment of the Senate. Mr. Kernan offered a substitute, to the effect that the votes purporting to be the Hayes electoral votes from Louisiana be not counted. After a long debate the substitute of Mr. Kernan was rejected, and the resolution of Mr. Sherman was then adopted by a strict party vote—41 to 28.

JOINT CONVENTION.—The Senate appeared in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 11 o'clock a. m., and the joint convention was called to order by Acting Vice President Ferry. The decision of the Electoral Commission in the case of Louisiana was then submitted and read at length. When the reading was concluded Mr. Ferry asked if there were any objections to counting the vote as received from the commission. Mr. Gibson said he desired to enter a written objection in behalf of certain Senators and members of the House, which was sent to the Clerk's desk and read. The objection proceeded to recite the entire proceedings of the commission in secret session on the 16th, and then protested that the said decision was wrong and contrary to law, in that the evidence was excluded. In connection with the protest, the pamphlet containing a statement of what the Democrats would prove if the evidence was admitted by the commission was read. The protest was signed by every Democratic Representative, and nearly all the Democratic Senators. When the reading of the document was concluded, Mr. Ferry asked if there were any more objections, whereupon Senator Wallace, of Pennsylvania, submitted an objection, first, that the decision was made in violation of the Electoral law; secondly, because the act contemplated that the commission would receive evidence regarding the election in the disputed States; third, because the decision disregards truth, honesty, etc. The objection was signed by several Senators and Representatives. Representative Cochrane, of Pennsylvania, also submitted an objection, signed by Senators and members, showing, first, that it was not denied before the commission that the Tilden electors received the largest number of votes; second, that it was not denied that Wells and the Returning Board were guilty of grave frauds; third, that the decision is in violation of the spirit of the bill, and of the constitution. There being no further objections, the Senate, at 12:55, withdrew.

HOUSE.—The Senate having withdrawn, the House, on motion of [illegible], voted to adjourn for the day.

TUESDAY, Feb. 20.—SENATE.—The Senate met at 10 o'clock, but no business was done, the Senators only awaiting a notification that the House was ready to continue the count of the electoral votes. This notification was made at [illegible], and the Senate repaired to the chamber of the House of Representatives. Upon returning, at 2:30 p. m., the case of Crossman, the alleged ineligible elector from Michigan, was taken up, and the following resolution, offered by Mr. Allison, was adopted by a vote of 40 to 17: "Resolved, That said vote be counted with the other votes of the electors of said State, notwithstanding the objections made thereto." The following, also by Mr. Allison, was unanimously agreed to: "Resolved, That the objection made to the vote of Daniel L. Crossman, one of the electors of Michigan, is not good in law, and is not sustained by any lawful evidence."... The Senate then repaired to the Hall of the House for the purpose of resuming the count, but shortly returned to consider the objections to the vote of R. M. Daggett, one of the Nevada electors. The matter was speedily disposed of by the unanimous adoption of a resolution offered by Mr. Jones, of Nevada, that the vote of Daggett be counted, notwithstanding the objections thereto.

HOUSE.—As soon as the House was called to order the regular business of the day was introduced by Mr. Gibson, who offered a resolution that the Hayes electoral votes of Louisiana be not counted. The discussion was carried on without any special excitement on either side, the Republicans speaking in support of the decision of the commission, and the Democrats in opposition. The only exception was in the case of Representative Seelye, who made a brief speech, advocating the throwing of the vote of the State (Louisiana) out altogether. He said that he believed the Democratic charges of fraud against the Republicans, and the Republican charges of intimidation against the Democrats, and for that reason he thought the vote of the State ought not to be counted. The debate lasted two and a half hours, and at its close the yeas and nays were ordered on Mr. Gibson's resolution that the vote of Louisiana, as declared by the Electoral Commission, shall not be counted, the vote standing 172 yeas to 99 nays. Two Republicans voted with the Democrats in favor of the resolution—Messrs. Seelye and Pierce, of Massachusetts. A message was sent to the Senate that the House was ready to meet that body in joint convention. The House subsequently met again, to consider the objections offered to the counting of the vote of D. L. Crossman, one of the Michigan electors. Mr. Tucker offered a resolution that the vote of Crossman be not counted. Mr. Jenks offered a substitute to the effect that, as it was not proven at the time of his appointment that Crossman was an officer of the United States, therefore, that the vote objected to be counted. This was agreed to without a division. The two houses then met in joint session. At a later hour, after the joint session had adjourned to consider the objections to counting the vote of Elector Daggett, of Nevada, the House voted to adjourn, without taking up the case of Nevada.

JOINT CONVENTION.—At 1:35 the Senate and House met in joint convention. The presiding officer stated that the two houses acting separately had considered and decided objections to the certificates from the State of Louisiana, and that the action of each House would now be read. This having been done, the presiding officer stated that the two houses not having decided otherwise, the decision of the commission would stand in force, and he directed the tellers to declare the vote of Louisiana. Senator Allison, one of the tellers, thereupon announced that Louisiana had given eight votes for Hayes for President, and eight votes for Wheeler for Vice President. There was no manifestation of any kind at the announcement, and the opening and counting of the certificates proceeded, the State of Maine giving seven votes for Hayes and Wheeler, Maryland eight votes for Tilden and Hendricks, and Massachusetts thirteen votes for Hayes and Wheeler. When the certificate from the State of Michigan was read, giving eleven votes for Hayes and Wheeler, Mr. Tucker, of Virginia, rose and presented an objection to the counting of the vote of Daniel L. Crossman, one of the electors, declaring that one Benton Hanchett having been elected one of the electors for the State of Michigan, and having held and is still holding the office of United States Commissioner, had absented himself from the meeting of the electors on the 6th of December, and that his place had been filled by the other electors. The two houses then separated to consider and act upon the objections. At 5:20 p. m. the Senators again entered the Hall of the House, and the joint convention was resumed. After the announcement of the concurrent action of each house in overruling the objection in the case of one of the Michigan electors, the eleven votes of that State were announced as being cast for Hayes and Wheeler. Then followed the State of Minnesota, with 5 votes for Hayes and Wheeler; Mississippi, with 8 votes for Tilden and Hendricks; Missouri, with 15 votes for Tilden and Hendricks; Nebraska, with 3 votes for Hayes and Wheeler; and Nevada, with 3 votes for Hayes and Wheeler. Mr. Springer objected to the count of one of the votes of Nevada, on the ground that Elector R. M. Daggett was a United States Commissioner at the time of his appointment. The objection having been read, the Senators withdrew.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 21.—SENATE.—Mr. Mitchell, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted a long report in the case of the Oregon electors, and asked that it be printed in the Record. Objection was made by Davis and Kernan, who claimed the report should be printed as other reports. Mr. Mitchell withdrew his motion and the report was ordered printed in the usual manner.... Mr. Sherman, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill to aid in the resumption of specie payments.... The Legislative, Judicial and Executive and the Postoffice Appropriation bills were discussed, amended and finally passed.

HOUSE.—Testimony to sustain the objection against the electoral vote of R. M. Daggett, of Nevada, was read, whereupon Mr. Springer, who made the objection, offered a resolution that the vote be counted, and explained that an error had been made in describing the office held by Daggett as that of United States Commissioner, while the testimony showed that he held the office of Clerk of the United States Court. The resolution was agreed to without division. The Senate was then notified that the House was ready to continue the count, and the two bodies met in joint session.

JOINT CONVENTION.—The Senate and House met in joint session for the purpose of counting the electoral votes. The presiding officer having called the meeting to order and directed the reading of the resolutions of each house in favor of counting the votes of Nevada, a teller then announced that Nevada had cast 3 votes for Hayes and Wheeler. Then followed, in succession, the States of New Hampshire, with 5 votes for Hayes and Wheeler; New Jersey, 9 votes for Tilden and Hendricks; New York, 35 votes for Tilden and Hendricks; North Carolina, 10 votes for Tilden and Hendricks; Ohio, 22 votes for Hayes and Wheeler. The presiding officer now opened and handed to the tellers the first certificate received from Oregon. It was read by Mr Stone, and proved to be the sworn certificate of the three Hayes electors, Cartwright, Odell and Watts, executed before a notary public. The papers contain a full statement of the doings of the three electors, the resignation of Watts as Postmaster, his subsequent choice by the other two electors, the original ballots cast by the three electors, etc. They were read in full. The presiding officer then handed to the tellers the certificate of the three rival electors—Cronin, Miller and Parker, authenticated by the signatures of the Governor and Secretary of State, with the seal of the State attached. This certificate gives two votes to Hayes and Wheeler, and one vote to Tilden and Hendricks. Senator Mitchell presented objections to the certificate of Cronin, Miller and Parker, on the grounds: First, because neither of the persons named in said certificate were appointed electors, as provided by the laws of Oregon. Second, that Watts, Odell and Cartwright were elected by the people of Oregon, in the manner prescribed by the laws of Oregon. Third, because it does not appear that the persons named in the Cronin certificate received the highest number of votes at the election for electors. Fourth, because it appears from the certificate of the Secretary of State that Odell, Cartwright and Watts were only elected. Fifth, because it appears by said certificate that Odell and Cartwright constituted a majority of the Electoral College, and controlled the Electoral College on the 6th day of December. The objections were signed by Senators Mitchell and Sargent and by Representatives Lawrence, Burchard (Ill.), and McDill. Senator Kelly presented objections to the certificate of Cartwright, Odell and Watts: First, that such certificate has not the certificate of the Governor of Oregon annexed, as required by law. Second, that the Secretary of State has no power to give a certificate, except in connection with the Governor. Third, that said Watts was ineligible because of holding a Federal office. Fourth, that Cartwright and Odell had no right of authority in law to appoint Watts to be an elector on Dec. 6, 1876, as there was no vacancy. Fifth, that it was the right and duty of the Governor of Oregon to give Cronin a certificate of election. Sixth, that Odell and Cartwright had no right to appoint Watts, as there was no vacancy, Cronin having been elected. Seventh, that Odell and Cartwright had no right to appoint Watts because they did not have the power to fill vacancies.

THURSDAY, Feb. 22.—SENATE.—Mr. Kernan introduced a bill to authorize the New York Land and Ocean Telegraph Company, a corporation under the law of New York, to lay, land and maintain lines of telegraph cable on the Atlantic coast, to communicate with Europe. Referred.... A bill appropriating $250,000, to erect a fire-proof building adjoining the Smithsonian Institution for a national museum, was passed.

HOUSE.—A resolution was adopted authorizing the President to accept the statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," when presented by the French republic, and to designate a suitable site for the statue on either Governor's or Bedloe's island.... A large portion of the day was consumed in committee of the whole, on the Deficiency Appropriation bill.

THE LOUISIANA CASE.

Grounds for the Decision of the Electoral Tribunal.

The decision of the Electoral Commission in the case of Louisiana is in language about the same as in that of Florida. It reads as follows:

The brief ground of this decision is, that it appears, upon such evidence as by the constitution and law named in said act of Congress (Electoral law) is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the before-mentioned electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such electors of President and Vice President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, 1877, of the State of Louisiana, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the constitution of the United States and the law; and the commission has, by a majority of votes, decided that it is not competent, under the constitution and law, as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde of the papers opened by the President of the Senate in presence of the two houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the Governor of the State, on and according to the determination of their appointment by the returning officers for elections in said State, prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or, by counter-proof, to show that they had not, or that the determination of said returning officers was not in accordance with the truth and fact—the commission, by a majority of votes, being of the opinion that it is not within the jurisdiction of the two houses of Congress assembled to count the vote for President and Vice President, to enter upon the trial of such question.

The commission, by a majority of votes, is also of the opinion that it is not competent to prove that any of said persons, so appointed electors as aforesaid, held office of trust or profit under the United States at the time they were appointed, or that they were ineligible under the laws of the State, or any other matter offered to be proved aliunde by said certificates and papers.

The commission is also of the opinion, by a majority of votes, that the returning officers of elections who canvassed the votes at the election for electors in Louisiana were a lawfully-constituted body by virtue of constitutional law, and that a vacancy in said body did not vitiate its proceedings.

The commission has also decided, and does hereby decide, by a majority of votes, and report as the consequence of the foregoing, and upon the ground before stated, that the paper purporting to be that certificate of the electoral vote of said State of Louisiana, objected to by T. O. Howe and others, marked N. C. No. 2 by the commission, and herewith returned, is not a certificate of votes provided by the constitution of the United States, and that they ought not to be counted as such.

The Dangerous and Terrible Quail.

[From a speech by Senator Harris in the Senate of Indiana.]

Each pair of quails produce an average of ten chicks per year—many, in favorable seasons, hatch out sixteen in a brood, and then hatch a second brood. If we estimate only the small number of 500,000 quails in Indiana to start with (though there are probably ten times that number), and take ten per year as the produce of each pair, the figures will simply be stupendous, and we present them to the Indiana Legislature for consideration:

First year, total	3,000,000
Second year, total	18,000,000
Third year, total	108,000,000
Fourth year, total	648,000,000
Fifth year, total	3,888,000,000

We would have to station an army along the Ohio river to prevent an invasion of Kentucky after these birds had eaten everything visible in Indiana. There wouldn't be a bug left in that State, and the birds would require grain to live upon. Estimating a gill of grain per day for each bird, it would require about 15,000,000 bushels per day to feed them. We enter our protest in advance, and shall demand, if Indiana does not pass the law, that the State shall raise the grain to feed the birds, and shall put up a bird-net 300 feet high along the Ohio, to keep their inhabitants from invading Kentucky.

The bill was defeated.

AGRICULTURAL AND DOMESTIC.

Around the Farm.

R. B. BOISE, of Willington, O., boasts the possession of a sow which, in three successive litters, produced an aggregate of sixty pigs, the largest number at one time being twenty-seven.

A COLT is the most confiding, sociable and inquiring animal on the farm, and, when rightly treated, delights to be guided or commanded by man. And he is the best boy, and makes the most useful man, who loves and delights in tenderly caring for his colt or horse.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Garden says: "Weeds in garden walks can be killed and prevented from growing in garden paths by watering the ground with a weak solution of carbolic acid, one part pure crystallized acid to two thousand parts water. Sprinkle from a watering pot."

KICKING MARE.—Nymphomania in mares sometimes is a fruitful cause of kicking. Spaying is sometimes the only effectual remedy. The operation, skillfully performed, is generally successful, though fatal cases oftener occur in mares than in other species of domestic female animals from the removal of the ovaries, be it never so skillfully done.

THE successful farmer is he who is always careful in selecting his seeds, uses good judgment in breeding stock, keeps his farm clean from weeds, always has his fences in order, and takes good care of his tools; keeps out of debt and has a contented mind; sends his children to school, and takes one or more good papers, devoted to farm and stock interests.

A CITIZEN of Yolo county, Cal., bought eighty-four hogs the past season and turned them into his vineyard, where they remained four weeks. He then sold them at the same rate per pound that he paid for them, and netted $150. It would seem from this that grapes are valuable food for hogs, and that farmers who are destroying their vineyards on account of the low price of grapes in the market might make a profit by keeping their vines and feeding the fruit to hogs.

DIVERSIFY more. Let us have more sheep. They are even a safe investment in grasshopper regions. There is no meat so wholesome as good mutton, and it is always in demand. And then wool commands fair prices, though a good deal of it should be worked up and used at home. In these hard times much money could be saved, if we had more home-made woolens and stockings, giving us something durable and substantial in place of the shoddy which comes in from abroad.

A CORRESPONDENT in the Country Gentleman says: "Some years ago, hearing complaint of weevil in wheat about the close of harvest, when I was ricking my wheat, I got fresh slacked lime and threw over the rick in building it—laying two courses of sheaves, then lime sufficient to whiten the stack. There was no weevil in my wheat. A neighbor who threshed his wheat from the shock came to me a few days after and said he should lose his wheat, for it was alive with weevil. I told him to throw lime over it, and shovel it through his wheat, which he did. Two days afterward there was not a weevil to be seen in it."

THE Western Farm Journal says: "A smoke-house built so as to prevent the admission of light and at the same time insure ventilation, and a degree of coolness so that the meat will not mold, may be had by placing it under the shade of a spreading tree. It should be built of brick, with an ample flue on top, protected with blinds at the sides, and a wire gauze at the bottom to prevent the admission of insects, the gauze to be removed when smoking the meat. Another flue at the bottom protected with gauze allows the admission of air. Thus the house may be kept cool and well ventilated, and by throwing it entirely open occasionally at night, when dry, meat may be kept perfectly for a long time. This smoke-house may be used for a variety of purposes, as for the keeping of ashes in districts where wood is used for fuel."

About the House.

LAMPS EXPLODING.—A small quantity of salt dropped into the lamp will render the oil non-explosive, and hence perfectly safe.

TO TAKE OFF PAINT.—One pound of pearlash; three pounds of lime slacked in water, and mix to the consistency of paint; lay on with an old brush, and let it remain on twelve or fourteen hours, when the paint can be easily scraped off.

MUFFINS.—To one quart of milk add two eggs well beaten, a lump of butter half the size of an egg, and flour enough to make a stiff batter; stir in half a pint of yeast; let it stand till perfectly light, and bake on a griddle in tin rings made for the purpose.

COFFEE WITHOUT USING FILTERS.—Have the coffee ground rather coarse, and mix it thoroughly with the white of an egg. Pour the water on when boiling hard and let it simmer fifteen minutes; pour off from the grounds at once and send to table.

CORN-BREAD.—Three teacupfuls yellow corn-meal, one teacupful wheat flour, one cupful sugar, one teaspoonful salt, two teaspoonfuls baking-powder; mix together dry, wet with tepid water to a thick batter; bake in sheet or patty pans in quick oven.

CARE OF BUFFALO ROBES.—The robes should be thoroughly cleaned by whipping them with a light rod, and then packed away in paper to keep from the air. A cedar chest will add to the protection. Fine tobacco or camphor sprinkled over them will be good.

RICE MERINGUE.—One cupful rice; boil in one pint water; add one pint milk, yelks of three eggs, juice and grated rind of one lemon; sugar to taste; after baking beat whites of the eggs to stiff froth; add one cupful sugar; spread over the pudding, and brown in the oven.

CHEAP RASPBERRY JELLY.—Boil one-fourth pound of dried raspberries in a pint of water for about ten minutes, then strain; bring the juice to a boil, sweeten to taste, and stir into it about two tablespoonfuls of corn-starch; after taking it off the fire stir a minute or two; when cold it is ready for use.

IVY ON WALLS.—There is popular belief that ivy growing upon a building renders it damp and unhealthy, which is quite unreasonable; in fact, if a wall, particularly a north wall, be damp, the best treatment is to plant English ivies at its base; for not only does the dense foliage of the plant keep out rain, but its aerial roots absorb the moisture already in the wall.

TO COOK RICE.—Wash in cold water several times, removing imperfect grains. To one pint of rice put three quarts of boiling water, let it boil seventeen minutes from the time it fairly begins. Turn off the water, remove the pot-lid, and put on the back of range, thus securing the grains being white, separate and dry. For griddle cakes, rice should be [illegible] boiled in cool milk in similar proportions, sweetened and flavored, and turned into wet molds to turn out when cold.

Cleopatra's Needle.

The London papers announce that the monolith popularly known as Cleopatra's Needle is to be erected by the Board of Works on the Thames embankment, if it can be transported from Egypt to the Thames. It is a single block of stone, about as high as an ordinary house in London, seven feet in diameter, and weighing, according to computations over 280 tons. Concerning its carriage by water, various opinions have been expressed by engineers; but it lies imbedded in the sand, within a comparatively few feet of the sea, and the latest proposal is to float it over between two gigantic rafts or pontoons. The Viceroy, Mehemet Ali, gave it to the British Government forty years ago.

FIFTEEN years ago a party of young French journalists arrived too soon at their restaurant to sup, after being at the fancy ball; they proposed, and carried out their idea, taking the place of ordinary waiters, and served a large party that had also retained a special table. The guests were so annoyed at the over-attention of the waiters that they gave them no gratuities, and only learned next day the joke. Two of these waiters were then bosom friends—Rochefort, of the Lanterne, and Paul de Cassagnac, the bully of the Bonapartists.

THE French Government is about to sell at auction the last four balloons which were constructed during the siege for escaping from Paris. These balloons are considered unfit for service, and the balloon committee will replace them with new ones, an appropriation of $40,000 having been made in the budget of 1877 ofr military ballooning.

KERRVILLE, Tex., boasts of a lady, long past the meridian of life, yet still hale and healthy, who depends not on masculine labor when anything has to be done. She plows her field, with three horses abreast, as well as the best man of them all; she puts up stone fence like an expert, and hauls wood for all her household.

Mr. Zimmerman's bill, fixing the time of holding township elections on the first Monday in April, biennially, failed for want of a constitutional majority. Mr. Koontz's bill, limiting township taxes to 5 cents on the $100, was passed, and afterward the vote by which it was passed was reconsidered.

The Senate bill to prevent the frequent change of text-books in the common schools was passed.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 21.—SENATE.—Bills were passed providing for the election of township officers in the spring; legalizing defective corporations; to change the name of the Evansville and Chicago Railroad Company.... The Compulsory Education bill failed.... The House joint resolution, favoring the restoration of the silver dollar of the coinage of 1792, was passed.... The House then went into committee of the whole to consider the State House bill. Mr. Hall moved to submit the whole question to the people. The motion was not agreed to. Mr. Overmeyer moved to strike out the enacting clause. Not agreed to. The House then considered the bill by sections, and sections 1, 2, 3 and 4 were amended and adopted, as follows: Section 1 authorizes the appointment of four Commissioners, two from each of the prominent political parties, the Senate to appoint two and the House two. The cost of the building is limited to $2,000,000. Section 2 makes the Governor President of the Board, and provides that he shall sign all warrants. Section 3 provides for the qualification of the members, and compels them to report semi-annually to the Governor; fixes their pay at $5 per day when actually employed, and mileage. Section 4 directs them to make all necessary rules and regulations. Bills were passed in relation to the forfeiture of fees by officers for overcharges, and to provide for the punishment of persons having in their possession stolen property, having stolen the same without the State.... A few bills of a local nature were introduced.... The Prison bill was laid on the table.... A resolution was introduced to refer the copies of the contracts for labor in the Northern Prison to the Attorney General, with instructions to take such action as he may deem necessary to protect the interest of the State.

HOUSE.—The Belt Railroad bill was passed, after a spirited discussion.... The consideration of the State House bill was resumed in committee of the whole, and sections 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13 and 15 were adopted, which are, in substance, as follows: Section 5 prescribes the method by which a plan shall be adopted, and gives preference to the plans recommended by the committee appointed in 1873. Section 6 authorizes the board to contract for material and labor, requires the usual bonds, and prescribes a mode in which contracts shall be made. Section 7 provides that the building shall be fireproof; that the best of material and most skillful laborers shall be employed, and that Indiana materials shall be used as far as practicable. Section 8 provides for the appointment of a Secretary of the Board, prescribes [illegible]. Section 9 gives the board the authority to employ a superintendent. Section 10 makes it unlawful for any person connected with the building to receive a bribe. Section 11 requires the architect to give bond in the sum of $100,000 to discharge his duties, and an additional bond in the same sum that the building shall not cost more than $2,000,000. Section 13, levying a tax of 2 cents on the $100, was adopted. Section 14, appropriating [illegible] for this year, was stricken out. The emergency clause was adopted. The bill as a whole was then adopted. The committee then arose, reported progress, and was discharged. The report of the committee was not concurred in. The bill was then laid upon the table by a vote of 66 to 31.

A CHAPTER OF ACCIDENTS.

HENRY REYNOLDS, of Petrieville, Mich., lost the lower part of his right arm while fooling with a buzz-saw.

MRS. DOW, of Pekin, Ill., met her death by falling through the trestle-work of a railway upon which she was walking. She fell a distance of thirty feet, and was almost instantly killed.

AT Bay City, Mich., a little boy of 12 years, named John Adams, while playing with a clothes-line in his father's yard, made a noose and put it over his head. His feet slipped while swinging, and, letting his weight on the line, choked him to death in a few moments.

A YOUNG man named Charles Moore, of Wayne county, Mich., met his death in a singular manner. He was holding his gun before him, when his dog jumped on the trigger, discharging the weapon, the whole charge entering Moore's throat, killing him instantly.

JOHN H. SMITH, of Jerseyville, Ill., aged 13 years, while at work in an elevator was caught on a line shaft, his arm torn off, and left hanging in the machinery. The other arm was broken off in three places, and afterward amputated. He was otherwise injured, and entirely stripped of clothing. It is thought his injuries will be fatal.

CHARLES GILBERT, employed in a saw-mill near Fort Wayne, Ind., met his death in a shocking manner. He was engaged in adjusting the machinery, when he was caught in the gearing, and, with frightful velocity, whirled up the belting. His arms were caught in an adjoining belt and literally torn from their sockets. His legs were broken in several places, one leg being nearly torn apart at the knee. His skull was crushed and his whole body mangled beyond recognition. Death was almost instantaneous.

MRS. CAROLINE LAMBERT, aged 101 years, was recently burned to death at Omaha. She had long been afflicted with pain in the wrist, and was in the habit of bathing it in kerosene oil. While thus engaged, she spilled some oil on her clothes. She then filled her pipe to take a smoke, and, while lighting the same, set fire to the saturated clothing by a spark, and was instantly enveloped in the flames. The unfortunate centenarian was burned to a crisp, and died in a few hours.

New Discovery in Tanning.

According to the recent process of Klemm of Stuttgard, the time required for tanning a calfskin has been reduced to sixteen hours, and that for an oxhide to two and a half days; but a more recent method, patented by Montoison, of Manchester, promises to accomplish the same in from a few hours to one day. At a trial made of it before experts, a sheep was slaughtered and skinned and the wool was removed from the hide in half an hour, by spreading it with a chemical reagent, without the aid of a scraper; and the hide, after having been placed in lime-water to neutralize the chemical agent, was passed through several chemically-prepared baths, which required but a few minutes, and was then washed and dressed in the usual way, and converted into marketable leather, only four hours having been consumed in all, while the old process would have required two to three weeks, and that of Klemm sixteen hours. Economy of time is not, however, its only recommendation. The wool is said to retain its softness and luster, so that it is not inferior to sheared wool. The leather is said to be in no respect inferior to ordinary leather.

Fish Culture.

The American Fish Culturists' Association has just held its sixth annual meeting in New York. President Roosevelt read a paper on the result of the artificial culture of fish in New York State by the commission. The shad fisheries of the Hudson had been so changed, he said, that there are now ten fishermen employed where there was one eight years ago. Prof. Milner read a paper advocating the protection of fish by legislation. Mr. Balteman said that in Holland there was a regular fishery police, and recommended a similar system for this country. Mr. Wilmot, of Canada, reported as to fish-culture there. Some 6,000,000 salmon and 9,000,000 white fish are nearly ready to be placed in the streams. There was a general discussion of fish legislation and interests, and a fish supper to close with in the evening.

A Needle's Travels.

Eleven years ago a Syracuse lady swallowed a needle. The accident caused some alarm for the time being, but was soon forgotten, as it did not disturb her health. Last week she complained of a severe pain in the hip in the region of the sciatic nerve. Medical aid was summoned, and two physicians succeeded, after a careful operation, in removing the identical needle swallowed eleven years since. It measured one inch and a half in length, and was not rusted, but perfectly black and polished in appearance.

THE ELECTORAL TRIBUNAL.

FRIDAY, Feb. 16.—The following is a brief minute of the secret deliberations of the commission upon the question of admitting evidence in the Louisiana case: Mr. Hoar moved that the evidence be not received. Mr. Abbott moved, as a substitute, that evidence be received to show that the act of Louisiana establishing a Returning Board for that State is unconstitutional, and the acts of said Returning Board were void. This was rejected by the following vote: Yeas—Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, Thurman—7. Nays—Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, Strong—8. A number of other propositions for the admission of evidence were presented and voted down, the vote in each instance standing 7 to 8, as recorded above. The vote on Mr. Hoar's original motion, that evidence be not received, was then adopted by the following vote: Yeas—Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, Strong—8. Nays—Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, Thurman—7. The following resolution was then offered by Senator Morton, and adopted by the same vote: Resolved, That the persons named as electors in certificate No. 1 were the lawful electors of the State of Louisiana, and that their votes are the votes provided by the constitution of the United States, and should be counted for President and Vice President. Justices Miller and Bradley and Representative Hoar were then appointed a committee to draft the report of the decision, with a brief statement of the reasons therefor. A recess of about one hour was then taken to afford time for drafting the report, which, upon the reassembling of the commission, was presented, and after being read was signed by Messrs. Miller, Strong, Bradley, Edmunds, Morton, Frelinghuysen, Garfield and Hoar. The report is to the following effect:

The Electoral Commission, having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of electoral votes of the State of Louisiana, and certain papers accompanying the same and objections thereto, report that it has duly considered the same, and has decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of William Pitt Kellogg, J. H. Brewster, A. B. Levisee, Oscar Jaffrain, Peter Joseph, J. H. Birch, L. A. Sheldon and Morris Marks, named in the certificate of William P. Kellogg, Governor of said State, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by certificates submitted to the commission, as aforesaid, and marked No. 1 by said commission and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the constitution of the United States, and that the same ought lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely, eight votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and eight votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice President.

The commission also decides and reports that the eight persons first before-named were duly appointed electors in and by the State of Louisiana.

The ground of this decision, stated briefly, is substantially as follows:

That it is not competent to go into the evidence aliunde as to the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified by the Governor of the State of Louisiana in and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment: in other words, to go behind the certificate of the Governor, so far as it is founded upon the action of the Returning Board.

The report also states that the commission could not receive any evidence to show that any elector was ineligible on the 7th of November, the day of the election, on the ground that it was not essential to show that an elector was eligible on that day so long as he was eligible when he cast his vote in the Electoral College, and the fact appears that the alleged ineligible electors, Brewster and Levisee, were chosen to fill vacancies caused by their own absence from the college, and there was no allegation of the ineligibility at the time they cast their votes.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 21.—The Electoral Commission met at 1 p. m., all the members being present. The papers received from the two houses of Congress relating to the votes of Oregon were read and ordered printed. Senator Kelly, of Oregon, then proceeded to submit his objections to certificate No. 1. He said he presumed that there would not be any dispute of the third objection, viz.: That Watts was a Postmaster, and they were prepared with proof to sustain the allegation. If this was an office of profit or trust, the constitutional inhibition was as clear as language could make it. Mr. Kelly argued that if Watts was not qualified on the 7th of November, when the election took place, he could not be elected at any subsequent election. He contended that by the constitution and laws of Oregon the person receiving the next highest number of votes was entitled to be declared elector, and that the Governor had a right to inquire into and decide the question of the eligibility of electors. Representative Jenks next addressed the commission on the Democratic side. Senator Mitchell then presented the objections in behalf of the Republicans. In his argument he said there was no law in Oregon authorizing the Governor to certify a minority candidate elected. The Legislature of Oregon might have provided that electors should be appointed by the Governor, the Supreme Court, or Secretary of State, but it did not; but it did direct that the people, the qualified electors, shall by a plurality of votes, to be cast in the different precincts, choose electors. Behind this ultimate determination of the Canvassing Board, neither the Governor of the State nor the tribunal whose final duty it is to count the votes for President and Vice President, whether it be the President of the Senate, the two houses of Congress, or the Electoral Tribunal, can rightfully go. Judge Hoadley then addressed the commission on behalf of the Democratic objectors. He contended that the action of Gov. Grover in withholding a certificate from Watts, who was clearly ineligible, and giving it to Cronin, the next highest candidate, was legal throughout, and that there is nothing in the law of Oregon which authorizes any such certificate or exemplification as is presented by the supporters of certificate No. 1. He said: "My proposition is that the State of Oregon, through her State officers, has spoken, and the result of that speech is here in the certificates given to Cronin, Odell and Cartwright. These are the only legitimate, lawful evidences of the act of Oregon in this matter. I submit that the certificate or list signed by the Governor and Secretary of State of Oregon and delivered to the College of Electors is final and conclusive evidence. Why were the Governor and Secretary required to sign these lists? It is because the chief executive of the State and the canvassing officer should unite in declaring who is elected, and when thus signed their signatures give it the conclusive and final evidence which is required." At the conclusion of Mr. Hoadley's argument the commission adjourned for the day.

THURSDAY, Feb. 22.—Judge Stanley Matthews addressed the commission in opposition to the Cronin certificate (No. 2). He contended that the Governor's certificate fell to the ground when it was shown that it was not a warrant to the electors for the performance of their duties. The law of Oregon required that the votes for electors should be given, received, returned and canvassed the same as for members of Congress, and in the case of members of Congress it was made the duty of the Secretary of State to canvass the votes, and there the statutory directions end. The statute in relation to electors further provided that the Secretary of State should certify two lists, showing who had received the highest number of votes, and there the canvass ended. The constitution and the law stamped that record the legal and constitutional result of the election. Mr. Matthews combated the proposition that the ineligibility of Watts made a non-election, or that the votes cast for an ineligible candidate were void. For the Governor to take upon himself executive, judicial and legislative powers, was to bring about a complication that would make the confusion of the Government inextricable. At the conclusion of Mr. Matthews' argument, Judge Strong said that the counsel had now consumed two hours each, and still the question of the admissibility of evidence was before the commission. He thought it should be resolved now, subject to the judgment of the commission as to its effect. The proposition was adopted. Mr. Merrick then offered as evidence a certified copy of the commission of John W. Watts as Postmaster, dated Feb. 13, 1873, and the commission of Henry M. Hill as his successor, dated Jan. 3, 1877, in which it was recited that he (Hill) was appointed Nov. 8, 1876. Postmaster General Tyner was called by Mr. Evarts. A telegram from Watts resigning his Postmastership was received Nov. 14, and the answer accepting the resignation was sent on the same day. John W. Watts was called, and testified to the same facts relative to his resignation.

After listening to arguments by Messrs. Evarts (for the Republicans) and Merrick (for the Democrats) the commission went into secret session.

Cat Fur.

No longer are cats to be doomed to drag out a useless existence and waste their midnight melodies upon unappreciative ears, for a haven of rest is about being prepared for them on Mansfield island, Lake Erie. A purchase of that island has been made by a man who intends to stock it with black cats, take excellent care of them, and kill their progeny for their fur. He will feed them at first on fish caught off the shore by men who will live on the island; but after the enterprise is well started, by a rare system of economy, he will utilize the meat of the slaughtered cats as food for the living cats.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, FEB 28. 1877

WASHINGTON LETTER.

MONDAY, February 26th, 1877.

DEAR COURIER—Six days yet remain of the 44th Congress. There is a great deal of work to do yet, especially on the appropriation bills. The House has now under consideration the last one, the Sundry civil, which will doubtless go to the Senate to-morrow. The counting of the electoral vote is interfearing with the regular legislation, and many important bills have to go over until next session. The Senate is away behind in the consideration of the appropriation bills, but as yet there is little talk of an extra session.

The excitement [illegible] over the count, and it is impossible to conjecture what the six last days of the session will develope. From the west, hundreds of telegrams are being received by Democratic members to do all in their power to resist the iniquitous decision of the commission. The only way now left to defeat the game of the Republicans, is by fillibustering, and the decision in the Oregon case has made many advocates in favor of that line of policy. By protracting the proceedings until after the fourth of March there will have to be a new election. At first the fillibustering element on the Democratic side was greatly in the minority, but in the last three days it has increased in strength until now it is quite formidable. I shall not stop now to discuss the question whether this would be a proper course to pursue under the circumstances. There is great provocation to ignore the disreputable job set up by Morton and Garfield, to defeat the will of the people. To refuse to go behind the Governor's certificate in these states, and then reversing the rule in the fourth, to gain their ends, is a stultification of principle, so gross and flagrant, as to make almost anything justifiable to defeat the object for which it was done. On the other hand, a new election, unless brought about immediately by new legislation, will prolong the present suspense and prevent the relief so much needed by the country to-day. Some Democrats argue that having entered into an agreement for a settlement of the Presidential question, it is our duty, though the Republicans have proven outrageously false, in preventing investigation into frauds, yet it is our duty to proceed and finish the count, and show the people that there is an earnest desire upon the part of the Democracy to act fairly and honestly, in contra-distinction to the Republicans. But others say, shall we sit idly by and see the constitution and the law trampled upon, witness fraud in its worst form established as a precedent, see the people wronged out of their rights, their expressions at the ballot box ignored, and a farce made of the elective franchise, or shall we interpose the only means we have to prevent the consumation of a set of usurpers, who would not stop at wrecking our free institutions to secure their ends?

Friday evening we had the decision in the Oregon case, and if you could have seen how it fell, like a knell, even upon the Republican ears, you would have clearly seen there was little heart in the matter. Had it been in favor of Tilden there would have been a shout all over this broad land, that would have made the welkin ring. The Radicals are not greatly elated or proud of their success, while the Democrats are disappointed, but not cast down. The latter have held several caucuses, which have been quite animated, and a few southern members are looked upon with suspicion, because of their indifference in the face of the perpetration of this great fraud. In fact it is now apparent that the Republicans are not only playing their hands for the Presidency, but want to shape things so that the old whig party of the south, now allied with the Democracy, will come to their support. Ben Hill and a few more, who were so lightly complimented during the late campaign, as "rebels, ex-confederates, murders, &c.," would be taken into the Radical camp with great gusto, and our Republican friends in DeKalb would swallow the dose at one gulp, and toss their ready caps in the air for the new converts. The administration paper here says a more generous policy must be persued towards the south. But what would Morton do with no south to vilify and misrepresent. It is said as an argument to proceed with the count that the bankers and business men want the thing settled, but I saw a dispatch from the west, signed by farmers which read, "We say, d—n the bankers and their bonds; we want our rights—propose to have them, and expect you to insist on them in Congress."

Hewitt's speech last Saturday would indicate that Tilden is in favor of a completion of the count as that member has been charged as being the mouth-piece of the Governor. Hewitt is an honerable conscientious man, and I believe he expressed his own sentiments without regard to Tilden when he declared himself in favor of proceeding. There are a great many here who believe that we are on the eve of an entire revolution in both parties There is one thing certain—if Hayes is not inaugurated, the Republican party will be swept entirely out of existence, while, if Tilden does not win, the Democratic party, nationally considered, will require some concave power to bring it up as strong in four years as it was last fall, unless Hayes steers clear of the shoals and quick sands of corruption and fraud which the party has failed to do for four years past.

Hayes cabinet is already being made up for him, in which Evarts and Stanley Mathews, who worked so hard for him before the Commission, figure prominently. On that principal J. Madison Wells should not be overlooked. Mad worked hard for him on the returning board, and perspired a good deal before the committee, and his travail must not go unrecompensed. If Hayes must be forced upon us as our next President, if he will accept a position so tainted with fraud in the attainment, I wish him no bad luck. I have always heard him spoken of personally as a good man, and he seemed to me to be a [illegible] inure to the benefit of the people, and not for personal aggrandizement. Hayes is well off, and need not steal to live, though the fact that Tilden's wealth was used against him in the campaign. I believe that wealth is a good qualification, when not the only one. If the Governor will come here and clean out the augean stables in which more than three thousand stall fed cattle have contributed their filth for years, if he will kick out rogues and thieves and put in honest men, and if he can bring that power with him that should accompany one elevated to the highest office in the world, and with that power direct public affairs so that the people will be relieved of their terrible distress into which they have been plunged by his own party,—direct them so that the unemployed thousands will find employment,—so that the hum of machinery may be heard again in the land, and the factories resume their wonted activity, so that business will revive and prosperity gladden the hearts of the people, then will Mr. Hayes, meet the expectation of the country. This much would we expect of Mr. Tilden, and Hayes must come to the scratch with the same promptitude.

There was some little excitement here the other day over the farcial arrest of Col. Don. Piatt, editor of the "Capital." Don said something which the administration, through the micro scopic vision of father Taft, construed as seditious, and hence this commotion. The rads now claim that the Colonel was in favor of assassinating Mr. Hayes, though I read the item and never dreamed of such an inference. Had he stolen the rations of soldiers, made himself rich through post-traders, and swindled the government in contracts, he might expect some clemency, even a letter perhaps, as in the case of Belknaps asking the District attorney to "nolle pros," the case, but no, he has simply denounced a corrupt administration and a pretext is made to satisfy a party spite. Some of the Metropolitan journals, who have bush whackers here, dont like the Colonel, because he can get away with all of them, and they truckle to a mean low spirit. I like the Colonel for his true inwardness, and I believe the press generally will resist this attempt at the abridgement of its rights and prerogatives, especially those free, untrammeled journalists, not dependent on the favor of a stock concern for bread and butter.

By the way, the gallant Gen. Lee is here who proclaimed so eloquently at Waterloo and Auburn last fall upon the faults of Tilden, and became so amorously attached to the chambermaid at the Swinford House. Well, this same General, gallant fellow is here, Macawber like, waiting for something to turn up. There is a roseate sweetness about the fellow that is perfectly charming, especially among the dimi-mond, and the admiration seems to be mutual. I had the pleasure of meeting in the Reporters Gallery the other day, Miss Grace Greenwood, Miss Grundy, Mrs. Geo. Gates, Bessie Beach, and through them got a chance to see many of the noted ladies of the city and I want to tell you all about them next week if I can find the time.

It seems that there has been some sharp rivalry between Auburn and Garrett, but we feel confident that there should be no ill feeling, as our interests are in a measure identical with those of Garrett from a railroad standpoint. As a case in point, a few days since we had a short conversation with one of the B. & O. officials, and gleaned the following facts. In the course of the interview the gentleman said: "A majority of 'the citizens of Garrett feel an interest 'in the growth and prosperity of our 'close neighbor, Auburn, and believe 'the feeling is fully reciprocated, and 'that only a friendly rivalry should exist between the two places. As regards the railroad company, they have 'no feeling against either town, expecting the patronage alike of all the towns 'on this Division. Some people in Garrett feel a little sore because Dr. Spooner has been selected advisory surgeon for the Chicago Division. The 'selection was made on merits only, 'and speaks well for the wisdom of the 'officers in making this selection, both 'as regards the man and location."

We notice that the National Sunday School Association of the Northwest, in Convention at Waterloo, Iowa, recently, have decided upon a grand excursion over the various railroad lines from the eastern cities, to Clear Lake, Iowa commencing on the 15th of August next and closing on the 31st. The point chosen for the excursionists to assemble is said to possess rare advantages for such an occasion.

CHAS. KLOTZ.

One would think while walking along our streets that Auburn was already a city. The improvements made within the last few years, and at a time when every one is crying hard times, is certainly marvelous. The latest improvement is one made by Hollister & Benedict, in the way of as fine a sign as grace any city.

DeKalb county papers have been so used to "pecking away" at us that they have an idea it will always hold out. We would advise them to stop it, or they will surely get left—things have changed.—Republican.

We see things have somewhat changed since Henry Little, Esq., has became editor of the Republican, notwithstanding the name of the firm is at the top of its columns.

See the advertisement in this weeks COURIER of D. D. Snyder. We do not wish to be misunderstood when we say that Mr S. has the largest and most complete stock of agricultural implements in DeKalb county. Yes we mean it and can prove it.

How many men does it require to solicit job work for the Republican? There is one certain man in this place who seems to interest himself a great deal in that direction. Perhaps he knows our business better than we do, our prices, material, &c. Whoever the "shoe fits" let him put it on.

Our juvenile hook and ladder company is not to be sneezed at. If they are boys and their machine inferior to that of the senior company, their by-laws are more strictly adherd to, and we doubt if the older company can place their ladders and run them up so spryghtly than the juniors. Encourage them they may be of use some time.

The reading given by Miss Cowan, at the Presbyterian church last Friday evening was a success in every thing. Miss Cowan is too well known, and has received too many enconiums by the press in general, giving her a reputation as one of the best readers of the country, that it would be useless for us to attempt to raise her fame to a higher standpoint, sufice to say that all who attended feel amply repaid.

NEIGHBORHOOD NEWS.

AUBURN JUNCTION.

Dave Carruth of the B. & O. spent last Sabbath with his friends in Auburn.

The season has arrived when the speculative grocer boils down the settings of his molasses barrel, and floods the country with small cakes of new maple sugar.

Ducks are beginning to arrive and the boys are fixing up their little shot guns.

Ensleys Avenue is to be put through soon.

The balmy, spring like weather still continues much to the satisfaction of the loafers hereabouts.

The Auburnits were down in "shoals" last Sabbath, and it wasn't much of a day for "suckers" either.

Why cant the Junction have a base ball club of its own!

Monsieur Thomas Knapp, the soft voiced patent right agent, who did Mr. Smith, (who is in the beverage line,) out of an overcoat and six weeks board has been heard from at Jackson, Mich., where he is on the lay for another sucker. Thomas is a rum critter.

Prudent chickens roost high in this neighborhood. But there is a shot gun laid up in the corner for the thief who is generally known and whose short commings are numerous.

The many friends of Mrs. James Wherrett, who has been seriously indisposed for a week or more, will be glad to learn that she is on the mend and will soon be herself again.

Master Chas. Smith, the pigeon-holist, shoots a wicked gun. Charles is a precocious youth, anyhow.

Don Pedro has a fine tooth for maple sugar. Don says there is nothing too rich for his blood.

A large amount of wood and ties has been destroyed along the Eel River road by fire. Sparks from the engine dropped into the dry grass, was the cause, and the loss of over three hundred ties and many cords of wood. We presume that accidents of this kind are unavoidable to a certain extent; but might not a little more watchfulness on the part of [illegible] engineers partially prevent the wholesale destruction of property belonging, generally, to persons that can ill afford to have the result of months of hard work. We understand that railroad company's will not pay for wood or ties thus lost, if not estimated.

THEOPHILUS.

CORUNNA.

Wheat took a tumble on Monday, nevertheless the receipts have not fallen off, if anything show an increase. On yesterday buyers were offering $1.44 for No. 2 amber, and $1.28 for No. 1, do. There were no transactions in stock since our last quotations, the eastern market having collapsed; dealers offer [illegible] for stock hogs and 6@6½ for dressed. Clover seed, $3.75; Corn, 50c; Potatoes, $1.60; Hides, green, 5c. The Egg and Butter trade is improving, and our shippers and dealers report an increase over last week. We quote eggs at 10c and butter at 15c.

Not long since we were agreeably surprised to meet a former acquaintance of Sandusky, Ohio, in the person of Mr. J. Lansdown. In more halcyon days, Mr. L. was acting in the capacity of Train Master of the C. S. & C. R. R. Co., at Sandusky but at present is a citizen of Garrett and holds a position as engineer on the B. & O. railroad. We notice that in the whirligig of time, the genial and happy Joe "holds his own" with the general average.

They have a ghost in Fairfield, and the superstitious denizens of that hamlet are wild with stories of his ghostship's exploits. In one of the swamps adjacent to the Center, where the lightning bug with his fire-fly lamp holds its nightly revelry, and the owlit hoots o'er the dead man's grave in a cemetery hard by, a ghost is reported to be seen trooping forth at the midnight hour.

We learn that J. A. Marvin, manager of the Amateur Dramatic Company of Garrett, is making arrangements to place upon the stage at that place an Irish drama, with a full set of scenery and static effects, and that the Company contemplate visiting Corunna.

Pete Draggoo is now anchored in the Post Office building, having taken a new departure from a jolly clerk in a dry goods store to a proprietorship. In brief, the stock of groceries formerly owned by Mr. [illegible] having passed into the hands of the said Peter.

A new paper entitled the Butler Record, published at Butler, Ind., and edited by our former townsman, the Rev. Bacon, has made its appearance. The initial number pitches into our friend Weamer with a vengeance.

A protracted meeting by the U. B. Church Society is now in operation. The meeting commenced on Monday evening last, presiding Elder Brown, formerly pastor of this church officiating.

Uncle Ben Chaffee, P. M., is making some "internal improvements" in the way of a new side-walk on the south side of his store building.

There was a cotillion party on Washington's birthday eve at DePew's Hall. And all went as merry as the gambols of the cricket on the hearth.

Our friend of 'auld lang syne, Prof. H. Freygang, leader of the Angola Brass Band, was in town last week.

Dave Snyder, of Auburn, was in town Monday loaded with agricultural implements, southward bound.

We were pleased to learn that our young and highly esteemed friend, Charles V. Lewis, has had a promotion. He is now acting as cashier in the First National Bank of Mason, Ill.

That Spelling Match.

Preparations for the grand spelling contest to take place here on Friday evening, March 9th, are progressing finely, and the indications are that it will be the event of the season. Notices have been sent to every post office and school district in the county, besides many to private individuals. It is probable that after the first tournament is over a challenge will be given by a select set of nine spellers of Auburn to an equal number from Waterloo, or Butler, or any other part of the county, to spell on the following evening for another ten dollar prize. Auburn believes that she can take the lead in spelling as well as in other respects.

The latest swindle upon the farmers, is as follows: "A man, claiming to be an agent for a reaper and mower machine, calls at a farmer's house, and if possible, sells him a machine, at a heavy discount from the regular rates. The farmer signs what purports to be an order for the reaper and mower, but what is in reality a note. The agent sells the note, the farmer gets no machine, and is obliged to pay the note at maturity. This swindle has been practiced very successfully in the neighboring counties. Look out for these fellows, and if one of them comes to your house, set the dog on him.—Press.

That dog business may pay in some localities, but would it not be well to inquire of the agent what firm he represents. For instance D. D. Snyder, of this place, is dealing rather extensively in agricultural implements, and is well known to most of DeKalb's citizens. He will require no order before the machine is delivered. Would it not be well to give the agent or Mr. Snyder himself a hearing before the dog is brought into requisition?

Matt Menamra, proprietor of the Dewdrop at Garrett, is solid on the presidential question. He can neither be bulldozed or intimidated. As a verification of this statement, call and see him at his little house just around the corner.

The People Want Proof.

There is no medicine prescribed by physicians, or sold by druggists, that carries such evidence of its success and superior virtue as BOSCHEE'S GERMAN SYRUP for severe Coughs, Colds settled on the Breast, Consumption, or any disease of the Throat and Lungs. A proof of that fact is that any person afflicted, can get a Sample Bottle for 10 cents and try its superior effect before buying the regular size at 75 cents. It has lately been introduced in this country from Germany, and its wonderful cures are astonishing everyone that use it. Three doses will relieve any case. Try it. Sold by F. E. Davenport.

An' so I always tries to lay my treasuhs up on high.

Dar's just one t'ing dat pesters me, an' dat am dis, you see,
De ravens fed old 'Lijah, but de critters won't feed me.
Dey's got above dar business, an' just goes swoopin' roun',

[illegible] my faith was pow'ful strong;

But oh, my frien'ly hearahs, my faith it cotched a fall,
De aggravatin' fowls went by, an' nebber stopped at all.

De meal an' flour was almos' gone, de pork bar'l gettin' low,
An' so one day I 'cluded dat I had bettah go
To brudder Johnson's 'tater-patch an' borry just a few,
'Twas evenin' 'fore I got to start, I had so much to do.

It happened dat de night was dark, but dat I didn't min',

An' den I didn't car' to meet dat Johnson, foh I knowed
Dat he would sass me 'bout de mess ob 'taters that I owed.

SAVED BY A COFFIN.

Riding hard and fast, almost as for dear life, along the wilds of the vast and lone Western prairie, I found myself, to my intense astonishment, entering upon a straggling settlement, and pulled up to reconnoitre and consider. That I had missed my way was all too plain; for, on the course that I ought to have come, there was not a cabin or a single settler. Somewhere or other I had got out of the right track and into the wrong one.

Almost any traveler in the border sections would have been rejoiced to thus stumble unexpectedly upon a place where food and shelter might be obtained. At another time I should have been so myself. Not now. In the breast-pocket of my closely-buttoned coat I carried five thousand four hundred and ninety odd dollars in greenbacks. It was during our time of war. This money had been given into my charge to carry it without stopping, and by the most unfrequented route, to Fort L——, and place it in the hands of Col. Southard, who was waiting for it.

"Get through at your best speed," said the Major General to me when I was on the point of starting. "The money has been long due, and Col. Southard is showing some irascible temper over it. Should you scent danger en route ride in a careless manner, as though you had nothing about you. Be very cautious."

"Is it known that this money is going to him?" I asked.

"It is not generally known. Some few, of course, inevitably know it—the mail agent and a clerk or two. Still, I don't see that we need fear treachery from them; I think you will be all safe."

But here I was, having lost my route, and not knowing whether I was safe or not—at least, whether the money would be. And, now that I had blundered on to the verge of this scanty settlement, what must be my course? Should I halt for refreshment, as any ordinary traveler would, or should I ride straight through without stopping?

The latter course might of itself excite suspicion. So, pushing on to the house of entertainment with the most careless air I could assume, I got off my horse. If treachery had been at work I was, no doubt, being watched for on this route as on others, and should need all my cunning to escape—if escape were indeed possible. There were only two men in the bar-room when I entered, the landlord and the hostler. I ordered supper and sat down.

Two travelers next rode up and ordered drink. One of them went with the hostler, the other threw himself down on a bench outside and began filling a huge pipe. Strolling carelessly about the room, I managed to glance from the window. My heart leaped into my throat, for in the man seated there I recognized Bill Wolf, one of the most desperate characters that ever figured in the annals of border ruffianism. Yes, it was certainly he, and no other. There was the huge red mustache, the thick, hairy throat, and the shoulders hunched up around his head, suggesting the shape of a mammoth clam—and there was the voice with a deep-down intonation, like the plop, plop, plop of water hurriedly leaving a jug.

I sat down again and went through the form of eating my supper; but whatever appetite I might have felt, on my entrance into the inn, had vanished now. The discovery that this dangerous man, Bill Wolf, was at my elbow, filled me with suspicion and dire apprehension. His being there might be all chance; but —I did not believe it to be.

Presently the men came in together, and ordered supper. Mine was finished, and now was my chance to leave.

Paying my score, and saying a general good evening, I crossed the dim, smoky barroom. They took no notice of me whatever, not even returning my good night, only the landlord looked furtively after me. My spirits rose; I hoped my fears had misled me and that I should get safely away.

It looked quite duskish outside, but the hostler was flitting about the stable with his lantern, which emitted but a little more effulgent light than a white beam would have done; he brought out my steed, and I trotted away. The moon—a little past the full—would soon rise; and I pushed along at a smart trot, so as to get well out upon the plains and into the right trail before that time. I was feeling infinitely relieved at my providential escape from contact with the desperate characters which I had left at the settlement, when my acute, trained, ever-alert ears detected the sound of swift riding. In what direction? From behind me? Yes, for the mildly-floating breeze blew from that quarter. The face of the prairie in this section was a little rolling, but not so as to afford any shelter, and not a shrub or bush dotted the expanse for miles.

I drew up my horse one moment to listen. On they came. No chance travelers ever rode like that. It meant pursuit.

I gave my steed a lash and he broke into a convulsive gait, hove his body up with one or two plunges, stumbled, going down upon his knees to his nose, and pitched me literally heels over head. For an instant I was paralyzed with astonishment, wondering what could have taken my trusty and good horse; the next, I seized the bit to fetch up the fallen animal, for there was no time to lose.

But what was the matter with the horse? He had a white spot on his face, and this white seemed to come off on my hand as I touched him. A wet, slimy, sticky substance, bearing a remarkable resemblance to whitewash. With my heart in my mouth, I stooped to feel his white legs and feet. Yes, they were whitewashed, too. The trappings had been taken off my own horse at the inn, and transferred to this worthless animal, which had been whitewashed over to imitate mine.

This discovery brought an appalling interpretation of the oncoming horsemen. I gave the horse the whip as soon as his unstable legs were well under him, and sent him scouring on ahead; while I ran off on foot to the right, making for a little hollow that I saw in the distance. This proved to be a shallow, dry ravine; and here, to my profound astonishment, I discovered a low cabin, or hut, about the dimensions of an ordinary country log-cabin. Dashing up to this, for it was out my only hope of shelter. I gave a rapid succession of knocks. A shrinking, pale and cowering woman opened the door.

"What is it?" was her first question, noticing my breathless haste.

Had I taken a moment's reflection, I might not have given the true explanation as I pushed in by her. In all probability this secret hut belonged to my enemies. The moon was coming up dry and red in the east.

"Is there any chance to hide here? My horse has thrown me, and I believe a party of desperadoes are close up with me."

She mechanically closed the door behind me before I had finished my explanation. "No, no; there is no place," she gasped, her ear catching the sound of the coming horsemen. "This is all there is; this one room."

My eyes had been seeking for a piece of furniture, or else that I might lie concealed in—all in vain. Suddenly they rested on a dark object in the far corner.

"But this?—what's this?" I exclaimed, making a rush for it.

"It's a coffin," was her quick response. "But there's no other chance—they are turning up to the door. Get in."

I had barely time to place myself in this receptacle for the dead, when a hoarse voice that I had now too good cause to know, that of Bill Wolf, was heard outside. His heavy whip struck the door.

"Here, you Dick!—Is Dick here?"

The woman threw her apron over her head and opened the door.

"Where's Dick?"

"He has not come back!" returned the woman.

"Oh, not yet! Jenny, have ye heard a horse go by yonder?"

"Yes, just but now. I looked out, thinking one of ye might be coming. Seemed to have a small man on it."

"Driving on like the devil—eh?"

"Going fast," she answered. "You might, perhaps, hear its track still," she added, passing out and pulling the door to. "Listen!"

But Bill Wolf must have been of a suspicious nature. I heard him leap from his horse. For the life of me I could not help pushing up the coffin lid by a hair's breadth, and looking through the chink. A fire was burning on the stone hearth. Bill Wolf had a hand on each door-post. His brutal head was thrust inside the room, peering about.

"What's that?" he questioned. And my heart stood still, for I knew he spoke of my retreat.

"It is Staffer's coffin," she answered "Blue Rex left it here for Dick to take over to-night."

"Stuff!" ejaculated Wolf, contemptuously. "A coffin for the likes of him! As Staffer made his own bed, so let him lie on it."

"The boys wish it," said she, "and Dick promised."

"Dick be shot! He ought to be here. Are you sure he is not in? You've not got him in hiding anywhere?"

Wolf, all suspicion, went up to the rain barrel, and I heard him shake it. I suppose he thought "Dick" might have taken refuge in the water; then he came to the door and looked in again. Satisfied, he turned away, and mounted his horse.

"Are you in pursuit of the man gone by?" asked the woman in a timid, careless tone.

"Ay. But what's it to you if we are? He can't have gone far either, on that animal."

Riding away in search of me and of what I carried. Wolf clattered off. The woman watched him join two comrades, who had waited at a little distance; then she came in, and barred the door. I was out of the coffin in a trice.

"What shall I do? what shall I do?" gasped the woman. "They will be back in twenty minutes; for I believe that your horse is yet in sight; and my husband is also liable to come at any moment."

"Your husband might perhaps shelter me. He—"

"Him!" she emphasized it in despairing tones. "He is Bill Wolf's brother. I suppose you have managed to affront some of them. And they give no quarter."

I looked around in despair. To go out was to meet this Dick; to stay in meant discovery, probably death. The coffin was no longer available, for Dick was coming for it.

"It is death for you, any way," she moaned. "I hear the rattle of Dick's axle-wheels already."

"Stay, there's the rain barrel outside," said I, in desperation. "They've tried that once, they may not look in it again."

And before you would be able to speak a sentence, the water was dashed out of the cask, stealing down into the arid soil, and I was in the barrel, and the woman dropping a tub half filled with water in at the top as a cover.

She had barely time to re-enter the house, the door of which fortunately opened on the side away from the moon, when a rattling vehicle drew up at the door, and I heard a voice raving and swearing at the woman for something done, or undone; and then from the bunghole, the plug having been dislodged in the upsetting of the cask, I saw the furious return of the three other renegades. Hearing Dick's wheels they must have turned back. As to the steed they supposed I was on, they knew they could catch that up at any time, whatever the delay.

There ensued a good deal of loud talking, explanations, and oaths. A jorum of hot nectar was prepared, and they all went in to partake of it. Dick refused to join in the hunt after me, on account of having to take the coffin to its destination.

"Any way, we are bound on the same track," cried Wolf, "so you may have the pleasure of seeing us wing the turkey. Five or six thousand dollars. It's a prize we don't get a chance of every day."

"Won't old Southard swear when he finds the money don't reach him, and he doesn't know why!"

A shouting laugh. Dick's voice was heard as it died away.

"Is there water enough out there, Jenny, to drink my horse."

"I'll see," she returned, moving slowly over the sill. And then, leaping to the cask, she lifted out the tub and tipped my barrel over a little so that I could spring out.

"Hide where best you can," she whispered.

The best place, the only place seemed to be the dark corner between the cabin wall and the barrel. Dick came out, and led his horse up to the tub to drink. Then, turning the wagon endways, he went indoors, brought out the coffin with the help of one of the others, and slid it into the vehicle. Bill Wolf came out next.

"I've made another jug of nectar," called out the woman. And at the tempting words they all went back to the cabin. I believe the woman did it to give me time.

At that moment a wild and desperate plan entered my brain; but, feeling for my knife, I found that it was missing, along with the belt to which it was attached. In the sudden jostle which the steed had given me, the girdle had been snapped and lost without my knowledge. The horses of the three renegades—my own, which had been retained by the hostler at the inn, among them—were hitched on the farther side of the door, where the moonlight, striking by the end of the cabin, rested fully upon them. It was suicide to attempt seizing one of them—my own, as I had hoped so do—and riding off; so I embraced the only alternative. Creeping into the wagon, I lifted the coffin-lid, and again lay down in the long, narrow prison.

There was no choice. The flood of moonlight had swept so far toward my hiding-place that only a part of my body was concealed by the barrel, and I knew that discovery was inevitable, for the man's horse stood in such a position that, in order to recover the reins, he must have trodden upon me; and there was no earthly thing, as far as the eye could reach over the plain, behind which a man could hide. Ah, but what if he should re-adjust his freight? Can you think how my heart beat away at the thought? You wonder what my plan could be? I had none; other than the hope of having only one man to deal with, if Dick parted with the rest and went alone. He had said he would go with them as far as the "Forks;" after which, as I comprehended, his way would lie one road and theirs another.

The three others mounted, and all were about to start, when the woman ran out with some sort of a blanket, and muttered something about covering the coffin. Dick yelled out to her to mind her own business and let the thing alone.

But she succeeded in accomplishing her purpose. Disposing the blanket across the coffin, as he was beginning to drive away, she contrived to lift its lid and drop inside a bowie-knife. You may be sure I seized it heartily, and gave her a blessing, too, poor thing; and the first use I made of it was to lodge the lid up just a fraction. So that my breathing was easy, though my position was cramped.

"We'll beat up the game speedily now," said the horsemen one to another, the quantity of whisky they had imbibed, in the shape of "nectar," somewhat impeding their utterance. "He can't by any miracle have got yet into the wooded belt by Burford Springs."

"Horse couldn't take him there."

"Dick," they called back, as they were riding on, "a cool twelve hundred apiece! Throw out your old shell and join the hunt."

The driver mumbled some foreign answer, as if the nectar were clouding his understanding, and whipped up his horse. If he did attempt to move the coffin, I was lost.

They kept within hailing distance for the length of three or more miles, Dick smashing the heavy wagon along at a steaming pace; and I expected that the coffin would be jostled out.

By-and-by, there was a sudden shout; a loud "tally-ho," as if the huntsman had sighted his quarry. It came from the right. Nothing but an unwarrantable amount of liquor could have influenced them to conduct themselves as they did and to make this noise. The probability was that not a soul (save the one they fancied they were pursuing) was within miles and miles, but men bound on these raids are cautious. No sooner was the noise heard than my driver came to a halt. Listening for a moment, he threw the reins across the horse, leaped down, and started off towards his friends. Perhaps the temptation of the money (that they might then be dividing) was too much for him.

For one instant my heart stopped beating at thought of the hazard which I was about to run. The next moment I sprang from the coffin to the ground. A few lightning-like strokes, and I had severed the traces and the rude bands of the harness.

The whole scene is vividly pictured in my mind now. The moon-lighted prairie, the sloping ravine towards which the renegades had been dashing, and the wagon standing in the trail. I mounted one of the horses and urged him onward. All might have been well, had not the quick ears of the men caught the echo of his footsteps. Looking round, they saw me making off—and I think must have known me, for I was lighted up by the bright moonlight. With a wild shout, they came on in pursuit. There was the sharp report of two rifles. I felt a sting in my foot, another in my shoulder; but the horse was unharmed, and the race for life began.

There was one disheartening disadvantage for me; I had no saddle; but I was riding for my life, and I held my steed between my knees and took the broad trail with the fury of a tornado. The issue would rest chiefly with the horses. I knew nothing of the one which I rode; I knew nothing of those that were pursuing me, excepting my own white-faced horse. He could run like an antelope, and outwind a hurricane.

On, and on, and on, my steed, desperately spurred with the point of the knife, bore ahead, actually causing me to gasp for breath; and not 200 yards in the rear rode those would-be assassins.

On the rolling prairie now; and my animal took the declivities with a plunge, and the elevation with a sure, fierce stride. Across the brawling ford now—but crack came another rifle echo, and again a stream of fire seemed to strike my shoulder. They were closing in—closing up. I could now make out only two horsemen following. One of these had discharged his rifle at me; the other I supposed was keeping his in reserve until he should be a few yards nearer. I knew not where I was, how far I had come, or how far I had to go; but I did think and hope I must be nearing civilization and Col. Southard's camp.

Could I keep up this pace? Would the horse fail me? Away and away went we; I in front, they behind.

A momentary dizziness threw me forward on my horse's neck. Whether I should have yielded to the faintness, I know not; but a distant sound struck on my ear, and brought me up. Oh, it was good, that sound!—but I was not sure yet, I broke into the wild, long, fierce yell of the border rangers, and sped on again; but my horse had that peculiar twist now and then in his gait that told me he was faltering.

Again that echo reached me, swelling out on the rising wind, and my heart leaped up. It was the shrill music of the fife, and the rumble of the drums of the infantry; who were probably returning to camp from some expedition to Fort L——. Again I sent out that long, wild, border cry, and I knew by the quicker breathing of the fife and the rapid pulsing of the drum, that the soldiers had heard, and were coming to my rescue.

A parting shot fired at random, and my two pursuers turned; they could not face the soldiers. But one of them, at least, was not done with. I called my horse with a peculiar whistle that he knew. I repeated and repeated it; and then I heard him come crashing again in pursuit, while his rider shouted and lashed him, and tried to pull him round the other way. For a brief space of time, Wolf, for he it was, wrestled with the animal, lashed, goaded, roared at him; but my incessant, jerky whistle-call kept his mind and head toward me. Wolf only gave up the fruitless struggle and leaped from his back, when a squad of infantry dashed over a billowy swell of the prairie.

"It is Wolf," I panted, as they bore down. "Go in pursuit of him; I am all right now."

No need to urge them. A price was set on Wolf's head, as they knew, for he was the most dangerous and desperate outlaw of the time. I just saw some of them fly off—while the plain seemed to be rising and falling about me, and then quietly fainted; partly with fatigue and excitement, chiefly with loss of blood.

And when my eyes opened again, they fell on Mr. Wolf—a prisoner. Our men had brought him in to receive his deserts. As for myself, I was saved, and the money also.

"It was a near touch, Captain," observed one of the men to me, "and I should not have liked the coffin at all."

But it was the coffin that saved my life.

Rules for Winter.

Never go to bed with cold or damp feet.

In going into a colder air, keep the mouth resolutely closed, that by compelling the air to pass circuitously through the nose and head, it may become warmed before it reaches the lungs, and thus prevent those shocks and sudden chills which frequently end in pluerisy, pneumonia, and other serious forms of disease.

Never sleep with the head in the draft of an open door or window.

Let more cover be on the lower limbs than on the body. Have an extra covering within easy reach in case of a sudden and great change of weather during the night.

Never stand still a moment out of doors, especially at street-corners, after having walked even a short distance.

Never ride near the open window of a vehicle for a single half-minute, especially if it has been preceded by a walk; valuable lives have thus been lost, or good health permanently destroyed.

Never put on a new boot or shoe in beginning a journey.

Never wear India-rubber in cold, dry weather.

If compelled to face a bitter cold wind, throw a silk handkerchief over the face; its agency is wonderful in modifying the cold.

Those who are easily chilled on going out of doors should have some cotton-batting attached to the vest or other garment, so as to protect the space between the shoulder-blades behind, the lungs being attached to the body at that point; a little there is worth five times the amount over the chest in front.

Never sit for more than five minutes at a time with the back against the fire or stove.

Avoid sitting against cushions in the backs of pews in churches; if the uncovered board feels cold, sit erect without touching it.

Never begin a journey until breakfast has been eaten.—Hall's Journal of Health.

LIFE ON THE PLAINS.

A Duel by Moonlight—Eleven Shots Fired.

(From the Cheyenne (Wyo. T.) Leader.)

George W. Via has for some time past been in charge of a band of horses belonging to E. W. Whitcomb, Via's headquarters being at a ranch some twenty-five miles south of this city, on Box Elder creek, in Weld county, Col. A. H. Swan had a number of horses in this band also. A short time ago Mr. Swan discharged a herder named Granville Peak, but, not liking to turn the fellow away entirely, he told Peak to join Via, and thus earn his "grub" until he found work. Via came to Cheyenne last Friday, returning Saturday, and that night Peak inquired if he had brought any money for him. Via said he had not. Peak then asked Via to loan him a revolver, saying he wished to go out and kill a rabbit by moonlight. Via handed him a five-shooter, and Peak started out, but soon returned, saying it was too dark and that he did not feel well. He stuck the weapon into his boot-leg, and the men then took one or two drinks of whisky, when Peak proposed that they ride to Calloway's sheep ranch, six miles distant. Via consented, and they saddled up and started.

When about a mile from their cabin Via asked Peak how he was feeling. "Pretty well," he replied, "only I'm awful dry." Via passed a bottle of whisky to him and Peak took a large drink. Via noticed a strange glitter in his eyes as he returned the bottle, but thought nothing of it. A moment later Peak drew his revolver, threw his arm across the saddle and shot Via in the leg, inflicting a painful wound in the right calf. He then whirled his horse, spurred him forward, yelling like a demon, and again firing at Via. The latter drew his revolver and opened a lively fusillade, one shot striking Peak in the hip near the spinal column, passing through his body and lodging just under the skin of the abdomen; another taking effect in the back of the neck and coming out through the jaw, while a third mortally wounded Peak's horse, and a fourth passed through his hat. Peak of course emptied his revolver at Via, three of the five shots inflicting serious wounds, the first being, as stated, in the calf of the leg. The second struck him in the groin and ranged upward, where it may have struck a vital place, while the third ball struck him in the left wrist, shattering the bone, and making an intensely painful wound. When they reached the cabin Peak's pony fell dead. After lying there a short time Peak arose, saddled another horse, and rode to Calloway's sheep ranch, six miles distant, where he was cared for. Via was brought to this city, a surgeon summoned to attend him, and is as comfortable as good nursing can make him. Peak is said by Mr. Whitcomb to be subject to periodical attacks of lunacy, and when in such condition will arm himself, rush about excitedly, shouting that somebody is "after him," but never attacking his comrades. It is probable that he was out of his mind when Via reached home, and that the whisky he drank caused murder to enter his crazed thoughts, with the terrible result above stated.

A. T. Stewart.

Judge W. W. Campbell, writing from Cherry Valley, tells the story of the invitation given to Mr. A. T. Stewart to become Secretary of the Treasury. He says: "I dined with Mr. Stewart in company with Gen. Grant on the day when the invitation to become Secretary of the Treasury was given personally to him. As we passed from the parlor to the dining-room he pressed my hand, saying only, 'It has come.' After Gen. Grant left, Mr. Stewart opened the subject, saying that, though the invitation had been kindly and earnestly given, he could not possibly accept; that his business was so extensive he could not well leave it; and besides, he had no political experience, and, while he might be able to manage the financial department, he would not be able to meet the political wishes of the Republican party. After hours of earnest discussion it was finally agreed that if Bancroft Davis, who had expressed a wish to be Assistant Secretary of State (which office he obtained and ably filled), could be induced to take the place of his assistant in the treasury he would accept." After it was discovered that an old statute forbade his holding the office, Mr. Stewart said to the Judge that in his judgment the course he offered to take with his mercantile business would have been a substantial compliance with the law; that he had carefully matured a system in his mind for carrying on the department, and added, "I would have taken the oath of office."—New York Tribune.

A New Wrinkle in Sweeping Carpets.

In all our experiments we have found nothing so safe and serviceable as moistened bran. Instead of stopping to clean the broom every few minutes, sweeping the carpets with bran not only cleans the carpet, frees them almost entirely from dust, but keeps the broom clean at the same time. It must be moistened only enough to hold the particles together. If too wet, there are the same objections as to each of the various ways above mentioned. It will leave the carpet so damp that the dust will settle over it, and will deface the carpet more than it will clean it. Besides, it makes the work much harder, because the bran becomes heavy with much moisture. Distribute the bran evenly over the floor, and then sweep as usual. The bran scours and cleans the whole fabric. Very little dust is made when sweeping with it, and scarcely any settles after the work is accomplished, because every thread, bit of paper, lint or dust, is gathered into the mass of bran that is moved over the floor, and is so thoroughly incorporated with it that it cannot be easily separated. Carpets swept in this manner gather very little dust, as will be plainly seen when they are taken up for shaking.—Mrs. H. W. Beecher.

The Fop's Coat.

While a young lady at a recent evening party was talking about the "psychological significance of dress," and maintaining that a person's character could to a considerable extent be inferred from his attire, a foppish young Englishman, wearing a blue coat and brass buttons, inquired, with a supercilious air, what that kind of coat indicated, to which the young lady instantly responded, "The blue is indicative of the wearer's feelings; the brass, of his manners."

MY LITTLE MILLIONAIRE.

"And so you have married an heiress—
You, Tom, who at college avowed
That, of all things on earth, you detested
Fine ladies, self-conscious and proud.
Ah, well! I don't blame you, good fellow,
The next one—who knows?—may be me,
For 'tempora' still ends 'mutantur,'
And then 'nos mutamur,' you see!"

Now, what could I do but make answer
To such an assertion as this,
When looking askance from his glasses—
An odd, quizzing way of his—
My chum, for the sake of old friendship,
Demanded the how, when and where
And then a description, verbatim,
Of her I had called "millionaire."

To speak the plain truth, I'll acknowledge
The word may have dropped from my pen
When writing in haste to my classmate
The news of our marriage—but then
I'd never a thought he'd construe it
In this way—the mischievous boy!—
"An heiress, self-conscious, proud, haughty—
Ah, little one, timid and coy.

What thought had "we two" of base [illegible],
Of bank stock, or wealth of the mine,
When, standing beneath God's blue heaven,
Eye to eye, lip to lip whispered "thine"?
Yet, dearest, if riches are counted
By measurement simple and true,
Gold locks, ruby lips, heart's rare treasure,
Ah, how can I give you your due?

And though, when we talk about money,
Good fellow, I'm lost in the mist,
Since all that I know of "bonanzas"
Lies just in my brain and my wrist;
Still, when you come down to the matter
Of rare, sterling wealth, I declare
You were right, after all—I have married
An heiress—a true millionaire!

PITH AND POINT.

ISN'T this the era of good feeling?—Graphic. Feel of a buzz saw and see.

ONE of the most important rules in the science of manners is an absolute silence in regard to yourselves.

IN the present state of alarm regarding the safety of theaters, the ballet would seem to be an entertainment most likely to inspire confidence among the spectators, judging from the large amount of hose displayed on the stage.

"WHICH is the largest gland?" asked a Chicago medical professor of the newest arrival in his class the other day. The student buried himself in deep and attentive thought for a moment, and then, brightening up suddenly, exclaimed: "The largest gland, sir, is En-gland!" Then the professor kindly led the youth aside, and pathetically advised him to think no more of medicine, but to join a minstrel show, or enter an army.

Intimidated Chinese.

The people of Los Angeles took a very unique method of preventing a threatened influx of Chinese laborers. A party of 600 arrived there a few days ago and camped near the new depot. The citizens immediately started the report that the peculiarities of the climate causes the nose to grow to a formidable length, and that the Indians invariably seize Chinamen by their elongated appendage and wring their heads off. A few minutes before the time for the departure of the train for Indian Wells the Chinese seized their baggage, dashed it from the cars, and stampeded over the hills out of sight.

Married at a Circus.

That two circus performers should consent to be married in the ring, and thus be used as an attraction to the show, is not remarkable; but that a clergyman could be found to take part in the exhibition is astonishing. Such a thing took place in Philadelphia, the persons being Miss Ella Stokes, a rider; Rudolph Mettie, an athlete; and the Rev. S. S. Huff, an Episcopal pastor. The bride and the groom appeared as usual in the regular entertainment; and then the marriage ceremony was performed, to the great diversion of the assembly.

MINNIE WEISS, a servant in a family at Omaha, has received intelligence that she has inherited $240,000 by the death of a relative in Germany.

LIVELY DEADWOOD.

Men, Manners and Things in the Black Hills.

The Virginia City Chronicle gives a report of an interview with a gentleman just returned from Deadwood, as follows:

"Tell us all about Deadwood, Mr. Williams?"

"Deadwood may be considered a pretty lively town; that is, lively for a town of 2,000 inhabitants. Of course, it's the central camp, where all the gambling, fighting and business is done. Everything goes on a grand rush night and day. There is no regularity about anything. A man opens a place of business and makes lots of money, then he gets the prospecting fever, starts for the gulches, and shuts up his shebang. When a place is closed up it means that the owner is out digging, has been killed in a fight, or is off on a spree. We have no municipal government at all. Every man thinks he's Mayor of the town. Every once in a while the boys call a mass meeting, draw up resolutions, etc., and decide to incorporate the town, and have a Board of Aldermen; but at the end of the week nobody knows what has become of the resolutions or the Aldermen. We start a new city government every two weeks and bust one every week—if there is any."

"How about the theater?"

"Yes, we've got a little theater there, not nearly as well fitted up as your cockpit. The orchestra chairs are made of stakes driven into the ground, with a round piece of board about the size of your hand nailed on top. Admission $2.50; reserved seats $5. They run a sort of variety show, and sling in the jokes and stage business as broad as possible. The can-can was danced for some time until the boys got tired of it, and they said: 'Give us some singin', or we'll clean out the place. We want something elevatin',' and the manager had to import a female sentimental vocalist, at big expense, to appease the patrons. She sung 'Sweet Spirit Hear my Prayer,' 'Consider the Lilies,' 'I Know That My Redeemer Liveth,' and other high-toned music, and I thought that the boys would go crazy with delight. But they got tired of it in about a week. Fanny Garritson was the singer. I believe she used to be here."

"Many saloons there?"

"Saloons all over the place, and whisky four bits a drink. They put two barrels up on end, nail a board across for a bar, and deal it out. A miner who wants to treat pours some gold dust on the barrel-head and says, 'Set 'em up.' They never weigh the dust. Sometimes a man won't put down enough dust, but they never say a word; and if he's a little tight and pours out ten or fifteen dollars' worth, they never mention it. They have three faro banks running all the while. They don't use checks for the boys; when they won a pile of checks they threw 'em all over the place, and some were too drunk to handle 'em. So the checks got played out. Now a man puts a little gold dust in a dollar greenback and it goes for two dollars. Ten dollars' worth of dust in a ten dollar greenback goes for $20, and so on. They never weigh dust at all, but guess the amount."

"Have you a daily paper?"

"Yes, sometimes it's daily, and then when the compositors get drunk it don't come out for several days. If a man wants gun wadding he goes and pays four bits for a paper. Whenever they start a new city government they print a lot of ordinances; then there's a grand rush for the paper. Sometimes it come out twice a week and sometimes twice a day."

"Much shooting?"

"Oh, yes; the boys are all on the shoot. Every man carries about fourteen pounds of firearms hitched to his belt, and they never pass any words. The fellow that gets his gun out first is the best man, and they lug off the other fellow's body. Our graveyard is a big institution, and a growing one. Sometimes, however, the place is right quiet. I've known times when a man wasn't killed for twenty-four hours. Then perhaps they'd lay out five or six a day. When a man gets too handy with his shootin' irons and kills five or six, they think he isn't safe, and pop him over to rid the place of him. They dont kill him for what he has done, but for what he's liable to do. I suppose that the average deaths amount to about 100 a month; but the Indians kill some."

Terrible Double Murder.

A fearful crime was recently enacted on a farm belonging to Mrs. Turner, in Crawford county, Pa. A farmer by the name of Milton Anderson lived on the place as tenant. His daughter Maria, aged 16, became, recently, a subject of no little attention at the hands of Harrison Turner, a weak-minded son of Mrs. Turner. He expressed a determination to make the girl his wife, in spite of her openly-expressed dislike of his attentions and the refusal of her father to permit him to intrude his presence at the house. It became necessary within the past few weeks several times to eject the young man by force from the premises. Mr. Anderson and a hired man were walking across a field on the farm toward a piece of woods, when they were met by Harrison Turner, who was armed with an army musket. When the men were within a few paces of him he aimed toward them with his gun, and ordered them to halt. Anderson and his companion stopped, but had no idea that Turner intended them any harm. When they halted Turner said: "Milt, you are cut out for a ——, and I'm going to send you to where you belong." With these words he fired at Anderson, sending a whole charge of buckshot through him, killing him instantly. The hired man ran away in alarm, fearful that Turner would kill him. He carried the news of the murder to the farm-house, and all of Anderson's family hurried to the scene. The farmer lay on the ground where he had fallen. Near by lay the dead body of the murderer. He had reloaded the musket, placed the muzzle under his chin and fired, blowing his head and face entirely away.

But Where's the Cat?

The skeleton of a cat walked into Ryan's store at Hohokus. Ryan, seeing her, bawled out, "Mickey, didn't I tell ye a month ago to fade that cat a pound of mate a day until ye had her fat?" "Ye did, and I'm just afther fading her a pound." "Has that cat ate a pound this morning?" "Yes, sir." "Shure, I think it's a lie ye're telling. Bring me that scales. Now bring me that cat." The cat turned the scales at exactly one pound. "There, didn't I tell ye she had eaten a pound of mate this mornin'?" "All right, my boy, there's yer pound of mate, but where the devil's the cat?"—New York Mail.

Tupper on America.

Mr. Martin F. Tupper is in Charleston, S. C. The News of that city prints a letter which he has written to a friend in England, in which he praises this country without limit, and says:

"I note everywhere, as an unbiased traveler, a vast advance and improvement, not alone materially, but also mentally, morally and socially; and of all these parallel lines of human progress the marvelous Centennial Exhibition is the culmination and the flower. Contrasted with others I have seen, it is a Victoria Regia to a common water-lily. For mentals, there is not a better educated people on the face of the earth. Schools and teachers, churches and chapels, books and newspapers, are only almost too abundant; except among the newest emigrants from Europe, it is difficult to find an ignorant person, and there seems to be no home where the children are not habitually sent to school. For morals, which include socials, there is so vast a stride toward absolute temperance that Americans may now be called a water-drinking people. I have not yet seen a single case of intoxication, and habits of dram-drinking seem to be quite on the decline. No case of cruelty to animals, or even over-driving (perhaps the 2:40 trotting matches of racing men may be excepted), has met my glance. I have seen no street quarrel, no one handcuffed, nor heard one foul word or execration. Several cases of curious honesty have occurred to myself, while the general good nature and courtesy, and even self-forgetfulness, of the bulk of those one meets are traits abundantly noticeable. You may say, dear sir, that I take an optimist view of things, but I simply speak of what I see—that great cities cannot be without sin, nor human nature generally from folly, nor (as is hinted to me) political life purified from corruption, are manifest truths, but at all events the good is on the surface and not the evil, and no one has a right to condemn what he cannot perceive.

The Talmud.

Tryon Edwards, in Scribner's Monthly, says: The Jews, Protestants and Romanists all agree in receiving as canonical the books of our Old Testament. But as the Romanists would add to these the apocryphal books, so the Jews insist on adding their oral law. They say that when the written law was given to Moses, inscribed on two tables of stone, God also gave another and verbal law explanatory of the first, which he was commanded not to commit to writing, but to deliver down by oral tradition. When Moses came down from the Mount, they tell us that he first repeated this oral law to Aaron and his sons, and then to the seventy, and finally to all the people, each of whom was obliged to repeat it in his hearing, to insure its correct remembrance. Just before his death, they say, he spent a month and six days in repeating it to them again; and then, they assert, he committed it in a special manner to Joshua, through whom it was imparted to Phineas, and so on through the long line of prophets, and afterward of teachers, down to the time of Judah the Holy, who lived in the second century, by whom it was committed to writing lest it should be lost. This work, consisting of six books, is the famous Mishna of the Jews, which, with its Gemara, or commentaries, constitutes their celebrated Talmud, in which is comprehended all their learning and much of their religion as a people. The whole work is held by them in far higher esteem than the Bible, so much so, that they say the Bible is water but the Talmud is wine; and they even declare that he who studies the Bible when he might read the Talmud does but waste his time; and that to sin against the latter is far worse than to sin against the former. So implicit is their confidence in this oral law that it is almost useless to reason with a Jew out of the Old Testament; for he is ever ready with an answer from the Talmud, with the authority of which he is fully satisfied.

President Grant's Cabinet Changes.

Alluding to the announcement that the President would give a farewell dinner to the members of the Cabinet, a Washington correspondent says: "If he could assemble around his table all the gentlemen who have held Cabinet positions under his administration since he went into office eight years ago he would have a large company. No President ever had such an army of advisers. He has had two Secretaries of State—Washburne and Fish; four Secretaries of the Treasury—Boutwell, Richardson, Bristow, and Morrill; three Postmaster Generals—Creswell, Jewell, and Tyner; five Attorney Generals—Hoar, Akerman, Williams, Pierrepont, and Taft; four Secretaries of War—Rawlins, Belknap, Taft, and Cameron; two Secretaries of the Navy—Borie and Robeson; and three Secretaries of the Interior—Cox, Delano, and Chandler. In all twenty-three. Of these only one died in office, Gen. Rawlins; two were promoted to foreign missions, Washburne and Pierrepont; one went to the Senate, Boutwell; one, Richardson, was retired to the bench of the Court of Claims; three resigned. Only one, Fish, has held office through very nearly the whole period of Grant's two terms."

The Champion Liar.

A Detroiter declared in the presence of a dozen passengers on a Woodward avenue car that he had seen forty-seven feet of snow at one time in Omaha, burying up a town, that the snow was dug out, and under the crust the trees blossomed and boys went in swimming, the same as in July. One man ventured to ask, "What became of the crust?" "It's hanging up there yet!" replied the noble liar; "and the man who doubts my word wants to step off the car for half a minute!" No one accepted the challenge, and he commenced telling that he had seen hailstones that weighed six pounds each.

The City Council of Wichita, Kan., has been petitioned to appropriate $2,600 to the establishment of a public library and reading-room.

A BRITISH PAGEANT.

The Programme for the Opening of Parliament by the Queen.

The Whitehall Review publishes the arrangements for the opening of Parliament on Thursday, the 8th of February. The Queen will leave Buckingham palace shortly after 1 o'clock in the royal state carriage, drawn by eight cream-colored horses which are used only for these occasions. With the exception of one carriage (that one immediately preceding the royal equipage), which will be drawn by six black horses, all the other carriages will be drawn by the bays. The sovereign will be accompanied by Princess Beatrice. Her Majesty, who, until the death of the Prince Consort, used to pass through the grand entrance of the House of Lords, will alight from the [illegible] where the Queen will be received by the Deputy Lord Great Chamberlain (Lord Aveland), and the great officers of state. As in previous years there have invariably been many complaints by Peers and Peeresses of the extreme crowding around the door by which those personages enter the House of Lords, both on their arrival and departure, it has been deemed advisable to augment the number of police stationed in front of the upper house. In all there will be upward of 3,000 constables between Buckingham palace and the House of Lords. Those who have experienced the difficulties and discomforts of getting away from the House of Lords after the royal ceremony will doubtless remember why, on the next 8th of February, some arrangement could not be made which would render the task of getting away from the Peers' Chamber an easier one than has hitherto been. Under existing circumstances, a practical suggestion on this point may not be considered out of place. Just beyond Victoria tower there is a large open space, altogether unused at present, and likely to be so for some time to come. This vacant area might easily be made available as an immense waiting-place for carriages on the day of the opening of Parliament, with results which would be eminently satisfactory to all who have assisted at the ceremony.

A Fortune Gained.

The Boston Traveller says: "At the breaking out of the war in 1861 a citizen of Mobile, Ala., by the name of Nichols, espoused the Union cause, while all his family and relatives went over to the Confederates. He left the South, and, taking what he could, he started for the North to seek his fortune. For some time he has been filling the position of station-master at the Lincoln depot on the Fitchburg railroad. A few days since he sent in his resignation, as an uncle, recently deceased in Alabama, has left him heir to a fortune of over $1,000,000."

Why Advertise?

People sometimes ask why does Dr. R. V. Pierce, of Buffalo, N. Y., spend so much money in advertising his family medicines, which are so well known and surpass all other remedies in popularity and sale. It is well known that A. T. Stewart considered it good policy, and undoubtedly it paid him, to spend many hundred thousand dollars in advertising his goods, yet nobody questioned the excellence of his merchandise. The grand secret of success lies in offering only goods which possess merit to sustain themselves, and then through liberal and persistent advertising making the people thoroughly acquainted with their good qualities. Men do not succeed in amassing great fortunes, establishing thriving and permanent business, and founding substantial institutions like Dr. Pierce's Grand Invalid's Hotel at Buffalo, which costs over two hundred thousand dollars, unless their business be legitimate, their goods meritorious, and their services which they render the people genuine and valuable. Dr. Pierce does not attempt to humbug you by telling you that his Golden Medical Discovery will cure all diseases. He says, "if your lungs are half wasted by consumption, my Discovery will not cure you, yet as a remedy for severe coughs, and all curable bronchial, throat and lung affections, I believe it to be unsurpassed as a remedy." The people have confidence in his medicines because he does not over-recommend them, and when tried they give satisfaction. His Medical Adviser, a book of over nine hundred pages, illustrated by two hundred and eighty-two engravings and bound in cloth and gilt, is offered to the people at so moderate a price ($1.50, post-paid), that it is no wonder that almost one hundred thousand have already been sold. His memorandum books are on every druggist's counter for free distribution.

Popularity.

The popularity of Messrs. James S. Kirk & Co.'s soaps, manufactured in Chicago, is shown by the unprecedented sale which their goods have reached during the year 1876. This by far is the largest soap manufacturing concern in the United States, producing and selling in all parts of this country, from the Red River of the North to New Orleans, and from Portland, Me., to San Francisco, 25,000,000 pounds annually. No so-called greases enter into these soaps. Only pure refined tallow and vegetable oils are used, containing no adulteration. Fair and square weights always reliable. This is why their soaps are so popular with all good and economical housekeepers.

IF Congress had employed as much scientific skill in the arrangement of its "Reconstruction Policy" at the close, as the War Department did in the beginning of the war, in arranging for the manufacture of what was called Sheridan's Cavalry Condition Powders for the use of the Cavalry horses, no doubt the Union would have been restored long ago.—Exchange.

FRUIT HOUSE PRICES.

No dull times with us---Our trade continually on the increase.

No secret about it, simply purchasing our goods in large quantities of first hands and selling direct to our customers at a small profit, thereby saving them the profits of the middle men which adds 15 to 20 per cent. ; even forty per cent on some goods. This saving we are bound to give to our customers.

Take tea for instance: The advance on that article from the time it arrives in New and is sold to the speculator, and from him to the jobber, and from the jobber to the wholesale grocer, and from the wholesale grocer to the retail dealer, is at least 30 per cent. As each of these dealers has to make his 5 to 10 per cent. on the sale, and then the retailer, he must have his profit. and by the time it reaches the consumer there is at least 50 per cent added to it. We cut all these off by ordering direct from the importer and selling direct to the consumer. When we first commenced. our trade was two chests a month and now it is as many chests a day. So with all other goods, Sugars, Coffees, Tobaccoes, Fish, Spice or anything we deal in, we purchase at the first hands and resell direct to the consumer and save the profits of the middle dealers.

A fellow steped into one of our restaurants the other day and asked for a chew of the best tobacco there was in the house. The clerk hesitated a little [illegible] I'm going to buy some in a few minutes." "You better buy some now," said the clerk, Oh I buy my tobacco at the Auburn Fruit House." "Well I think you had better go over to the Fruit House and see if they won't give you a chew, we keep ours for sale," said the clerk. The fellow started out and as he got to the door he turned around and said, "you are confounded stingy here seems to me." Not much cheek, no, no.

A report somehow got in circulation that a gang of thieves were arrested at Garrett last Friday and that Theo. Sargeant, of the Sargeant House, was one of the number, of which there is no truth whatever. Were there a dozen gangs of thieves at Garrett, we can assure the many friends of Theo. Sargeant that they will not have occasion to blush for any crime he may commit; he isn't that kind of a fellow. We know Theo. to be one of the most jolly of good fellows, and he is far beyond staining his hands with crime.—[Republican.

Whoever coined and set afloat the silly lie exposed in the foregoing paragraph is either a knave or a fool, and were it not that a falsehood travels faster and farther than truth itself, this malicious slander upon a worthy citizen would not merit a refutation.

Scarcity of Money.

There is no doubt but the present condition of all kinds of business and industry is fearfully depressed, and it behooves every family to look carefully to their expenses. Spring is coming on when children are liable to Croup, Whooping Cough, etc. Coughs and Colds will prevail everywhere, and Consumption, with other throat and lung diseases, will carry off many.—These diseases should not be neglected. Doctor's bills are expensive, and we would advise our people to use Boschee's German Syrup. It never has failed. One dose of 75 cents will keep your whole family well during the winter. Two doses will relieve any case. Sold in all towns in the United States, and by your druggist P. E. Davenport.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

The First National Bank of Auburn Indiana tenders to the citizens of DeKalb county its facilities for the transaction of business. We loan money, receive deposits subject to check at sight or payable at a fixed date with a stipulated rate of interest. The Fiends-Twins's Diary.

January—Am born. Didn't want to be. Object immediately, as loud as I can. Younger brother born seven minutes later. Looks like a fool, but may improve as he mellows with age.

February—Catch a cold. Give it to younger brother. He is sicker than I am. Very nearly settles him.

March—Catch a nice rash. Pass it on to the other cove. Pretty well winds up his clock.

April—They've christened us. I'm Angus, and he's Alexander. Don't he look a ass of a Alexander! I'll kick him when he sleeps.

May—Got the nettle rash. Hooray! So's he!—Only worse.

June—They don't think they'll be able to rear him. He's to have codliver oil. Can't help laughing.

July—He's been squalling awful. Nurse says it's his nasty temper I know it's a pin,but I'm not going to say.

August—We've got a new nurse who talks to tall soldier and leaves perambulator basking in the sun. Alexander's got a blister on his nose. They don't know what it is, and they're going to give him a powder.

September—I've given him the scarlatina. He seems resigned. I've nailed his feeding bottle.

October—I've got a new game now—poking Noah's wife into his ear when the nurse aint looking.

November—We're begining to walk. He's weaker on his pins than I am, so I can shove him over easy.

December—I'm beginning to cut my first tooth. As soon as it's through I've made up my mind to bite Alexander.

Pat Among the Lawyers.

While a number of lawyers and gentlemen were dining at Wiscasset recently, a fellow who was from the [illegible] appeared and called for dinner. The landlady told him he should dine when the gentlemen were done.

'Let him crowd in among us,' whispered a limb of the law, 'and we will have some fun with him.'

The Irishmen took his seat at the table.

'You were born in this country were you, my friend?'

'No, sir; I was born in Ireland.'

'Is your father living?'

'No, sir; he is dead?'

'What is your occupation?'

'A horse-jocky, sir.'

'What was your father's occupation?'

'Trading horse, sir.'

'Did your father ever cheat any person while he was here?'

'I suppose he did cheat many, sir.'

'Where do you suppose he went to?'

'To heaven, sir.'

'What do you suppose he is doing in heaven?'

'Trading horses, sir.'

'Has he cheated any one there?'

He cheated one, I believe, sir.'

'Why did they not prosecute him?'

'Because they searched the whole kingdom of heaven and couldn't find a lawyer!'

Resolutions of condolence on the death of Bro. Jno. G. Davis—Died Jan. 2nd, 1877,—by the Brothern of DeKalb Lodge No. 214 F. & A. M.

WHEREAS, the Grand Architect of the Universe in His infinite wisdom, has seen fit to call from his labor on this earth to his reward in the Grand Lodge above, our worthy and beloved brother, John G. Davis in whom we recognize the attributes of a man and Mason. Therefore be it.

RESOLVED, that in the death of Bro. Davis the Craft has lost a cherished and beloved Brother, and our community a good and useful member, whose blameless character and honest integrity have left a bright record, and whose example is worthy of imitation

RESOLVED, that while we humbly submit to the will of Him who doeth all things well in His own inscrutable manner, we do most deeply sympathize with this afflicted family and friends of our brother in this their sad bereavement, and may He who bindeth up the broken heart, "who tempereth the winds to the shorn lamb" and He whose watchful eye never sleeps, watch over and protect them, and be their future strength and solace.

RESOLVED, further that our Lodge room be draped in mourning for thirty days in memory of our deceased brother. That a copy of these resolutions under the seal of the Lodge, be presented to the family of the deceased by the Master of our Lodge, and also be published in the Auburn papers.

How a Stranger Came.

"Here again, are you," exclaimed the court, as Mrs. Walker wheeled around in front of him.

'And it was the funniest thing you ever heard tell of,' she smilingly replied.

'What did I tell you when you were here six months ago?'

'Oh, well, this is a different thing, your Honor, and I'll tell you how it was. You see, my husband went down got his hair cut, his whiskers shaved, and his face washed, put on a paper collar and a red necktie, and when he came home I didn't know him. I was frying pancakes in the kitchen, and when he opened the door I thought it was a tramp, and says: Now you clear out, you lazy man. Then my husband says in a very mild voice, unnatural: 'Susie, you are the finest lady in Detroit.' With that I got mad your Honor, for I couldn't have a stranger talk that way to me, and I threw the spider at him and chased him half a block. Wasn't it strange, Judge, that I didn't know my own darling, precious husband?'

'Very strange, indeed,' was his chilling answer, and he called up Mr. Walker.

'You see,' began the husband, 'I was sittin' by the stove to warm my toes, when this woman, says she: Come, you great beast, go out after some wood! When I wouldn't go she came softly behind me and hit me with an old stove leg, and then she got a knife and chased me into the street.'

'Ah! my angelic Henry—my precious husband!' sighed the wife, winking to him to hold on.—Detroit Free Press.

Spencerville Items.

A case of assault and battery was tried before Justice Sanders one day last week, in which Wm. Wyatt and Charlotte Wyatt, his wife, and Geo. N. Wade were defendants, and Nancy Jane Boyle the complainant witness. It appeared by the evidence that the parties above named, together with several others met at the house of Geo. N. Wade on Sunday, February 18th, when Nancy Jane accused William with having put in circulation certain stories detrimental to her character. Words multiplied and the dispute waxed hot, and the gray mare seemed to be the better horse in the wordy encounter, when Charlotte, the spouse of William, rushed to the rescue of her liege lord. Chin music flowed freely until the passion of the two females reached a culminating point, when they collied and Nancy Jane was sent to grass, Charlotte follow-up her advantage, and hair pulling become the order of the day. The belligerents were finely separated by the lookers on, and kept apart until their passions cooled somewhat.

It appearing that Mr. Geo. N. Wade only acted in the capacity of peace maker, he was honorable acquitted Mr. Wm. Wyatt, and wife was fined in the sum of two dollars each. E. J. Boyle appeared as attorney for the State, Messrs Draggoo & Simonton appeared for the defendants.

I am informed the attorney's displayed great tact in managing their respective sides of the case, and that their arguments was profound and exhaustive.

The funeral services of Perry Ulm, the young man that committed suicide one day last week near St. Joe. Station, was held in the M. E. church in this place on the 20th inst, at 1 o'clock p. m. The church was filled to overflowing and a very solemn impressing discourse was delivered by the Rev. Man, to an attentive and appreciating audience. This young man had been laboring under a disease of the kidneys for some time past from which he at times suffered greatly. It is supposed while laboring under the great anguish incidental to his disease, his reason was over thrown and hence he committed the rash act.

The protracted meeting at the M. E. church is still in progress. The excitement and interest has been great the past week, about thirty has been forward at the alter as seekers of religon, large proportions of which has found peace in the Saviour. And the end is not yet.

Our barber thinks of advancing the price for shaving democrats while the Republicans are clamoring for a reduction in the price. So it goes.

Colds and sore throats are the order of the day.

Rev. Lancaster is holding a protracted meeting at Bear Creek church.

Rev. E. W. Errick is holding a protracted meeting at Springfield church.

A Deaf Man Explains Things.

'Augustus Peralto,' said his honor at the Fifty-seventh street police court yesterday, 'you are charged with being intoxicated; what have you to say?'

Augustus put his hand over his ear and said 'What?' in a loud tone.

'You were drunk,' shouted the court abruptly.

'Certainly, certainly,' said Augustus with great politeness, 'here's my card.'

'I don't want your card. How did you happen to get drunk?'

'Bologna,' said Augustus Peralto, smiling.

'Bologna!' said his honor, 'that's a new intoxicant. How old are you, Augustus?'

'Eighteen hundred and seventy-two,' said he.

'Where did you get your liquor?'

'In Italy, your honor.

'You were taken to the station house in a cart, were you not?'

'Yes, sir, we had a stormy voyage; it took us four weeks.'

'Well,' said the court with a smile, 'how long do you think I ought to give you on the island for this offense?'

'Thirty-two years, sir.'

'Sergeant,' said his honor, 'send this man down stairs and get some one to inform him that he is fined $10.'

A ROSARY OF SONNETS.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

I.—NATURE.

As a fond mother when the day is o'er,
Leads by the hand her little child to bed,
Half willing, half reluctant to be led,
And leave his broken playthings on the floor,
Still gazing at them through the open door,
Nor wholly reassured and comforted
By promises of others in their stead,
Which, though more splendid, may not please him more;
So Nature deals with us, and takes away
Our playthings one by one, and by the hand
Leads us to rest so gently, that we go
Scarce knowing if we wish to go or stay,
Being too full of sleep to understand
How far the unknown transcends the what we know.

II.—IN THE CHURCHYARD AT TARRYTOWN.

Here lies the gentle humorist, who died
In the bright Indian summer of his fame!
A simple stone, with but a date and name,
Marks his secluded resting-place beside
The river that he loved and glorified.
Here in the autumn of his days he came,
But the dry leaves of life were all aflame
With tints that brightened and were multiplied.
How sweet a life was his; how sweet a death!
Living, to wing with mirth the weary hours,
Or with romantic tales the heart to cheer;
Dying, to leave a memory like the breath
Of summers full of sunshine and of showers,
A grief and gladness in the atmosphere.

III.—ELIOT'S OAK.

Thou ancient oak! whose myriad leaves are loud
With sounds of unintelligible speech,
Sounds as of surges on a shingly beach,
Or multitudinous murmurs of a crowd;
With some mysterious gift of tongues endowed,
Thou speakest a different dialect to each;
To me a language that no man can teach,
Of a lost race, long vanished like a cloud.
For underneath thy shade, in days remote,
Seated like Abraham at eventide
Beneath the oaks of Mamre, the unknown
Apostle of the Indians, Eliot, wrote
His Bible in a language that hath died
And is forgotten, save by thee alone.

IV.—THE DESCENT OF THE MUSES.

Nine sisters, beautiful in form and face,
Came from their convent on the shining heights
Of Pierus, the mountain of delights,
To dwell among the people at its base.
Then seemed the world to change. All time and space,
Splendor of cloudless days and starry nights,
And men and manners, and all sounds and sights,
Had a new meaning, a diviner grace.
Proud were these sisters, but were not too proud
To teach in schools of little country towns
Science and song, and all the arts that please;
So that while housewives span, and farmers plowed,
Their comely daughters, clad in homespun gowns,
Learned the sweet songs of the Pierides.

V.—VENICE.

White swan of cities, slumbering in thy nest
So wonderfully built among the reeds
Of the lagoon, that fences thee and feeds,
As sayeth thy old historian and thy guest!
White water-lily, cradled and caressed
By ocean streams, and from the silt and weeds
Lifting thy golden pistils with their seeds,
Thy sun-illumined spires, thy crown and crest!
White phantom city, whose untrodden streets
Are rivers, and whose pavements are the shifting
Shadows of palaces and strips of sky;
I wait to see thee vanish like the fleets
Seen in mirage, or towers of cloud uplifting
In air their unsubstantial masonry.

—Atlantic Monthly for March.

WHY KITTY DID NOT KILL HERSELF.

Miss Kitty Gibson, aged 19, eyes blue, complexion peachy, health perfect, had made up her mind to die.

This decision had been reached after much deep reflection, some sharp twinges of regret, and a fierce conflict with conscience; nevertheless, it had been reached with unalterable firmness. Perhaps a physiognomist would have declared that firmness was not a quality of mind possessed by Miss Kitty Gibson, and by so declaring he would have proved simply the absurdity of his own science. What though her chin was not square and angular, after the manner of Joan of Arc's—did that indicate a lack of courage, self-reliance, or determination? May not blue eyes sometimes look out from as fathomless depths as black? And may not a fixed resolution form itself in the breast of a pretty, peachy-cheeked girl of 19 as well as in the maturer bosoms of aquiline-nosed maidens? Thus would Kitty Gibson have reasoned with any physiognomist who might have intruded his obnoxious arguments upon her, as she sat, on a certain winter's day, gazing out of the kitchen window.

The question of a speedy death had been settled beyond all quibble or doubt, and it remained now only for this young lady of suicidal proclivities to determine what means she should employ to consummate her design. A pistol would be quick and effective, but there wasn't a pistol in the house. Poison, particularly strychnine, presented itself to her mind as a Mecca for all death-coveting maidens; but there was the difficulty of procuring the drug—of reaching the Mecca. What would Hiram Griswold think if she were to go to the village store and ask him for an ounce of strychnine? And would one ounce be enough? She might hang herself in the barn, but that was more properly a masculine method of self-destruction. She might cut her throat with Uncle Randolph's razor, but for a lingering recollection of the difficulty she had experienced in sharpening lead-pencils with that venerable instrument. Besides, such a plan would disfigure her dreadfully, and she desired, above all things, to be a neat and comely-looking corpse. There was yet another way open to her, and that was the river. This impressed her more favorably than either pistol or poison, rope or razor. Even such sensible heroines as those who figure in George Eliot's novels were given to watery graves, and drowning seemed at once the simplest, the most agreeable, and the most romantic method of putting an end to her burdensome existence. The river it should be—the broad, swift Connecticut, which flowed within half a mile of Uncle Randolph's house, and which seemed at the precise moment, to Uncle Randolph's pretty niece, designed by Providence to afford her a moist and peaceful exit from this dry and warring world. She would drown herself just as soon as the ice melted. And, this weighty question having been decided, Miss Kitty Gibson rose up from her seat, filled the tea-kettle with water, and replenished the fire with a stick of wood.

Except they be insane, girls of 19, with comfortable homes and good digestions, do not make up their minds to drown themselves without cause. I will not say without sufficient cause, since that might plunge me into a defense of suicide under possible conditions—a line of argument which no Christian story-teller would care to follow. Kitty Gibson was not insane, but she believed that circumstances rendered excusable the step she was about to take, that is, a step into the Connecticut river. Called upon to analyze and explain these circumstances, she would have brought forth as the result of her self-searching, first, love unreciprocated; next, pride deeply wounded; and last, a heart which she believed to be broken so hopelessly that not even the magic of time's cement could mend it. A month before, Kitty Gibson was the happiest, as well as the prettiest, girl in the State of Connecticut; at least that is what everybody who knew her said, and no doubt that is what Kitty herself thought, although she did not, of course, acknowledge the fact to others. A month before, and she was counting the days until spring, until the dawn of that blossomy May, when she was to be married. What was it that had turned the thoughts of this young lady from bridal veils to poisons, pistols, and other horrible subjects? What could it be, except a quarrel with Jack? Obviously, nothing. Obviously, Kitty and Jack had quarreled.

Now there are Jacks and Jacks in this world, but, with the single exception of Jack Burroughs, Kitty Gibson cared nothing for the whole pack of Jacks. He was her right bower, with which she fully intended to play life's game, and make all the points desirable. That, at least, had been her intention a month before. But now—now, alas! she had turned him down. The mustard seed from which had sprung this many-branched tree of misery had taken root at Helen Clapp's party. Indeed, Helen herself might be termed the seed. With Helen Jack had danced the opening reel, which everybody knew was a shocking breach of etiquette. He ought to have danced it with Kitty, with his affianced bride. Like the spirited young woman she was, Kitty Gibson punished her lover by accepting an invitation to supper from Cyrus Phelps. Jack was dumfounded at this behavior, while Kitty enjoyed her triumph, and ate her ice-cream demurely. It is to be confessed that Cyrus Phelps was not the most agreeable of companions; that his range of conversation was limited to the weather and to the condition of the roads; and that, whenever he attempted to strike out into broader fields, he lost himself completely in the marshes of grammar and the pitfalls of language. Kitty did not care for this, however. She was watching out of the corners of her bright eyes, and, with a gleam of wicked satisfaction, the forlorn face of Jack Burroughs; and she accepted Cyrus, with his plural subjects and singular verbs, as a necessary adjunct to the infliction of her righteous punishment. When the hour for going home arrived, Kitty, bundled in shawls and furs, took her seat by Jack's side in the cutter, but said never a word.

"Perhaps you would have preferred Cyrus Phelps' company to mine," remarked the young man, when they had ridden a mile without speaking.

"And no doubt you would be very much happier if Helen Clapp was sitting at your side," rejoined Kitty.

"G'lang!" said Jack, touching the flanks of his horse with the whip.

This was the first instance on record where Jack Burroughs had sought to get over ground rapidly with Kitty Gibson in the cutter at his side, and the stars twinkling overhead.

When the sleigh drew up in front of Uncle Randolph's gate, Jack, holding the reins in one hand, helped Kitty to alight. His face was very stern and grave.

"Good-night," said he. And with that, for the first time since their engagement, Jack drove off without kissing the red lips which he had a right to kiss.

If the red lips pouted, or possibly quivered, there was no one present to see. And if the owner of those red lips, so cruelly neglected, cried herself to sleep that night, Jack Burroughs was profoundly ignorant of the fact.

This, then, was the little seed which had grown into a tree of misery mustard-like in proportions.

On the very next day Kitty had written a note to Jack, beginning "Mr. Burroughs," requesting the immediate return of her letters and picture, and signed, "Respectfully yours, Kate Gibson." When lovers fall into such strait-laced formalities of expression as these, what is to be expected? Jack sent back the letters and picture; and from the moment of their receipt Kitty began to meditate upon the simplest and most agreeable method of suicide. Her cogitation culminated, as we have seen, in a final resolve to throw herself into the Connecticut river—just as soon as the ice melted.

Had Uncle Randolph been a man quick to detect the exterior evidences of a broken heart, or even of a broken engagement, he must surely have seen that something was wrong with Kitty. As it was, however, Uncle Randolph was not quick to detect anything, except, perhaps, opinions differing from his own. A man of political, religious, social, or moral beliefs antagonistic in any way to the political, religious, social, or moral beliefs of Uncle Randolph was held by the latter to be a rascal. Nor would the minor virtues of honesty, integrity, and industry in any manner mitigate the ultimate conclusion, or compensate for the fatal differences. Uncle Randolph held it to be a truth as self-evident as any of those set forth in the Declaration of Independence that a man who supported Thisism and not Thatism was a knave. And yet Uncle Randolph was a very good man at heart, as was abundantly shown by his acts. He talked like a terrible bigot, yet he did all things in a spirit of broad catholicity. He had denounced the unfortunate father of Kitty Gibson as a worthless scamp (chiefly because he was a Thisist), and yet when this worthless scamp came to die he took Kitty to his own home, and cared for her as tenderly as though she had been his child. Besides himself and his pretty niece, Uncle Randolph's household included his maiden sister Martha, his aunt, whose memory stretched back through the mists of eighty years, and Tom Turner, a distant twig of the family trunk, who never troubled himself to find out why it was that he came to be numbered among the family. Uncle Randolph devoted himself chiefly to protracted and heated discussions in Hiram Griswold's store; old Aunt Charity spent all her time in knitting; Miss Martha kept her mind fixed upon the household duties; while Tom Turner's mind, such as it was, drew nourishment principally from the writings of Sylvanus Cobb, Jun. Thus severally occupied, none of the members of the family had found time to discover that Kitty's heart was broken. It was known, in a vague sort of way, that the young lady had quarreled with her lover, and that Jack Burroughs had not visited the house for a month; but then young ladies were always quarreling with their lovers, and no doubt Jack would turn up again in good time. Taking this sensible view of the matter, Uncle Randolph continued his discussions, Miss Martha her scrubbing, Aunt Charity her knitting, and Tom Turner his regular doses of peppery literature. And it is to be added that even Kitty herself, influenced, no doubt, by the course of those about her, followed very closely in the accustomed grooves of life, and ate her three meals a day with tolerable relish. Yet she had fully made up her mind to die.

Like all well-conducted heroines who drown themselves, Kitty determined to leave behind her a touching little letter, wherein forgiveness should be extended to all her enemies, and an appeal made to her friends not to mourn her loss.

"I will write that letter now," thought she to herself, pouring the water into the tea-kettle.

And thereupon, as a proper preliminary to all epistolary effort, Kitty brought out the dictionary, a sheet of paper, and a lead-pencil, and sat down to bid the world a final farewell. The date was left blank, to be inserted when the sun should thaw the ice in the river. The early winter twilight was deepening into darkness, and the kettle was singing on the stove, when Kitty finished her letter. One or two of the hard words in which her heart-rooted grief found utterance were searched out in the dictionary; for this suicidal young lady would have deemed it shocking indeed to have left behind her so momentous a document with any slips of orthography. Thus Webster reassured her doubting mind as to "melancholy," and determined the order of vowels in "relief." And it was while Kitty was yet picturing to herself the effect which this pathetic letter would produce upon those who loved her—in which category Mr. Jack Burroughs was not included—that the sound of Uncle Randolph's voice broke in upon her reveries. With a blush and a start, Kitty thrust the sheet of paper into the dictionary and closed the volume.

"He is a scoundrel and a thief," she heard her uncle say, as he drew near the door. "You can't tell me anything about the Marshalls; I've known the whole race of 'em for twenty years. Old Silas Marshall went from Windsor to Hartford, and sold soap and candles, and, during the Jackson campaign——"

Precisely what the late Silas Marshall did during the Jackson campaign was not told at that moment, for the door opening cut short the thread of the conversation. Uncle Randolph walked into the kitchen, while behind him, self-confident and smiling, walked Mr. Jack Burroughs. Trembling all over, Kitty rose up from her seat and thanked the twilight which hid her face.

"Where's your aunt Martha?" inquired Uncle Randolph. "Jack has come over to eat supper with us. Why don't you light up?"

"Here's a match," said Jack, and he held out his hand.

"Aunt Martha is up stairs," answered Kitty, addressing herself to her uncle, and paying no heed to Mr. Burroughs' proffered match. "I'll go and call her." And with this the young lady beat a hasty retreat.

"That Josiah Marshall is a scoundrel and a thief," resumed Uncle Randolph, as he took down the kerosene lamp from the mantel-piece. "I'd like to kick him, and the whole tribe of Marshalls along with him!"

"It's a pretty numerous tribe," observed Jack, good-humoredly. "Let me help you to put on that chimney."

While Jack was adjusting the lamp, Miss Martha, who never found time to dress up, as she expressed it, until late in the afternoon, entered the room. Miss Martha was a capital housekeeper. Moreover, she was what the New Englander calls "smart" and the Englishman "clever." And she was what all the world, in divers tongues and dialects, calls "eccentric." Perhaps one of her most noticeable eccentricities was that of mixing the names of the members of her own household. Tom Turner was called "Randolph" quite as often as he was "Tom," and Kitty answered promptly, when addressed as "Nancy," albeit the only Nancy in the family had married a dozen years before, and was living now in Oregon. Jack Burroughs had long before grown familiar with this peculiarity, so that when Miss Martha, upon entering the kitchen, said, "Is that you, William?" Jack responded, cheerily, "It is."

"Well, I'm proper glad to see you," exclaimed Miss Martha. "It seems an age since you've been inside the house. Take off your great-coat, and come into the sitting-room and get warm. How's Lydia and the folks?"

Jack gave a satisfactory account of the health of the Burroughs family, and Miss Martha then withdrew to look after the supper.

Meantime Kitty, who had rushed to her own room, with face flushed, hands trembling, and bosom heaving, had donned her best black alpaca, and combed out the braids of nut-brown hair, which was hers by growth and not by purchase. Not that she did this in honor of Jack Burroughs. By no means. She would have done it for anybody—anybody who was going to stay to supper. And she tried hard to convince herself that it was not because of Jack that her face flushed and her hands trembled. What was Jack to her now? Had he not sent back her letters and picture, and kept away from her a whole month? And was she not a heart-broken maiden, resolved to die as soon as the ice in the Connecticut river melted? These thoughts whirled through her brain as she fastened a bit of white lace at her throat—lace which Aunt Charity had once worn, when knitting was not her sole aim in life—and took a final peep at her pretty self in the double-sectioned mirror. At all events, it made her conscious of her beauty, and caused her to forget the terrible letter lying between the pages of the dictionary down stairs.

When Kitty went into the sitting-room to announce that "supper was ready," she saluted Jack with chilling politeness, and addressed him as "Mr. Burroughs." This ought to have stabbed the young man to the heart, but it didn't. He looked very grave, to be sure, and called her "Miss Gibson," but there was the old roguish twinkle in his gray eyes, and Kitty detected at once that, under his assumed gravity, there was a desire, restrained only by continued exertion, to burst out laughing. Naturally this vexed the young lady to a degree where tears would have been a sweet relief. It was not enough, then, that this wicked, deceitful, cruel Jack should make a plaything of her heart, but he must needs exult over his atrocious conduct. Kitty could have cried with a relish, but she remembered her letter and her resolution to die, and so, in lieu of tears, she drew solace from that grim thought.

At the supper-table Jack was unusually talkative. He complimented Miss Martha upon the excellence of her flaky biscuits, and emphasized his appreciation by eating half a dozen of them; he expressed his cordial sympathy with Uncle Randolph's desire to kick the tribe of Marshalls, and evinced a deep interest in the plot of the story which Tom Turner had just devoured; he shouted the praises of Aunt Charity's knitting in tones so lusty that the old lady was made to hear, albeit she was wont to declare herself "so proper deef she couldn't hear anything;" and as for Kitty, this wicked Jack bombarded her with such a volley of interrogatories that she was forced into an unwilling conversation. When the meal was at an end, Kitty persisted in helping Miss Martha wash the dishes.

"You'll only hinder me," expostulated the elder maiden, "and besides you've got on your best dress. Go into the sitting-room and entertain Jack."

But the younger maiden was fixed in her purpose. So she went to her room to don an apron, and left Jack to entertain himself.

Thereupon, the heir of the house of Burroughs picked up a bulky volume and sat down by the open fire in the sitting-room. The bulky volume proved to be Webster's Dictionary, which careless Kitty had thrown on the table on her first hasty retreat from the kitchen. Jack turned over the leaves listlessly until he came to a sheet of paper written upon in a chirography pleasantly familiar. Of course it was highly improper for him to read that paper, yet as a chronicler of simple facts I am forced to record that he did read it. And this is what it contained:

To dear Uncle Randolph, and all who love me:

I have determined to drown myself, because I am tired of life. My heart is broken, and I can see no relief except in death. Forgive me for what I am about to do, and I shall pray to God to forgive me also. I do not want to live and suffer as I have suffered——

Here the words "since Jack" were scratched out, and in their stead was written, "during the past——" (a blank to be filled in when the ice should thaw).

I forgive everybody. I hope you will not mourn for me, nor remember my melancholy end, because I do not deserve it. With love to you and to dear Aunt Charity and Tom, I remain, Yours, KATE.

How many times Jack read and re-read this singular document will never be known, but when Kitty entered the room, a quarter of an hour later, he was still sitting with the dictionary upon his knees and the paper in his hand.

"I thought Uncle Randolph was here," said Kitty, hesitating whether to remain or not, and failing to observe what it was that so absorbed Jack's attention. He turned with a start, as though first conscious of her presence, and thrust the sheet of paper back into the volume. Then he said, very gravely:

"Your uncle is not here, Kitty. Won't you be seated? I want to talk with you."

Kitty sat down upon the high-backed sofa, and fell to studying the figures in the carpet. Jack went over and took a seat by her side. She did not notice that he held the dictionary under his right arm.

"Kitty," said Jack, with becoming solemnity, "I do not believe that you have been very happy during the past month, have you?"

Kitty's lip began to tremble, but she answered, desperately, "Why shouldn't I have been happy?"

"Because," replied the candid Jack, "you have not had me to torment you."

"You mean to say that I can not be happy without you, Mr. Burroughs?" Kitty was still gazing intently at the carpet, so that she did not see the smile that played about Jack's mouth as he answered:

"Yes, I have reason to believe that without me you would be very miserable."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Kitty. "I should like to know what right you have to believe that?"

"Well, Kitty, I judge you by myself. I have been wretched ever since the night of that unfortunate party. I made up my mind yesterday to swallow my pride and come here and ask you to forget and forgive. We were both to blame, although the fault, no doubt, was mine to begin with."

"If you have been wretched, as you say," rejoined Kitty, her eyes fixed on the floor, "why didn't you go to Helen Clapp? You would surely have found comfort there."

"Nonsense, Kitty! I care nothing for Helen Clapp—no more than you do for Cyrus Phelps. I haven't seen her, nor have I wanted to see her, since the night of the party."

"You take it for granted, I presume, that I will overlook all that has happened without a word."

"I did not take it for granted, Kitty, until—"

"Until what?" Here the young lady turned her eyes suddenly upon Jack, and discovered for the first time the volume under his arm. "What is that book?" she demanded, blushing scarlet.

"That," returned Jack, with tantalizing composure—"that is Webster's Dictionary. While you were engaged in washing the dishes I was improving the time by a study—"

"Give it to me this instant!" demanded Kitty, springing to her feet.

Jack handed her the volume without a word. She snatched it impetuously, and turned over the leaves until she came to the letter.

"You have read it!" she exclaimed, crumpling the sheet of paper in her hand.

"If you mean your farewell epistle," rejoined Jack, gravely, "I have."

"Why, Jack!" And, thereupon Kitty threw herself upon the sofa, and, with her face buried in the cushion, began to sob convulsively.

And what did Jack do? Perhaps he drew her to his side and told her what a very, very wicked girl she was to think of drowning her pretty self. Perhaps he repeated to her, for the thousandth time at least, the story of his love, which had grown and deepened during a month of self-inflicted torture, and which was dearer to him than all else in life—dearer than fame or fortune, or even the Phi Beta Kappa key which he had won at Yale. Perhaps he soothed her with soft words, and rested her head upon his breast, and convinced her that, after all, she had much to live for in this world, and that her heart was not so seriously shattered as she had fancied. Perhaps, even, he kissed her; but that is no affair of ours.

Whatever Jack may have done, this much I know to be a fact: when the ice in the river thawed, Kitty did not throw herself into the waters of the Connecticut. And when the blossomy May came round, she blushed prettily because people called her "Mrs. Burroughs."—Harper's Bazar.

Two Good Bear Stories.

No. 1.—By "Texas Jack:" "I was once out with a party in Texas, and we came across a big cinnamon bear. A fellow proposed to capture him with his lasso. He made a good throw, and got the loop around the bear's neck. When old Cinnamon felt it get tight, what do you think he did? He just sat up on his haunches, felt of the rope with one paw, and then began pulling it in hand over hand. There was a horse and a man fast to the other end of the rope, and they had to come, both of them. As for the hunter, he jumped off and got away, but the bear drew the pony right up to him, and killed him.

No. 2.—By the Glencoe (Minn.) Register: "On Thursday last a son of Christian Hanson, about 9 years of age, went to a straw-stack near the stable to get some straw for horse-bedding. He says while pulling out the straw a huge black bear held him in such a way that he could make no resistance, but, after running a considerable distance, nearly half a mile, and leaping a high fence, the monster seemed to get out of wind, and let him drop on the ground, while he stood over him with his great red tongue hanging out of his mouth panting for breath. The boy says he seized hold of the bear's tongue with both hands, and held on until he raised upon his hind feet and scratched him in the face with his fore paws so hard that he let go and ran. The bear did not follow, and the little fellow made the best time possible toward the house. Mr. Hanson was away from home at the time. The next day he and his neighbors followed the bear's track for some distance and the citizens of Helen will make it warm for Bruin if he does not return to his hole."

Railway Tickets.

About forty years ago, railway tickets were originated by a station master at Clapham, England. From that time the printing of these tickets has remained in the hands of the same family, who have pursued it with an amount of perseverance and ingenuity perfectly marvelous; and it is a curious fact to know that in one long, low building in a suburban street of a provincial town the tickets of the whole world, except North America, are made.

Improving Upon Gen. Pleasonton's Discovery.

John B. Last, of Green Bay, Wis., has invented a new kind of stove-pipe hat. It is intended for the benefit of bald-headed married men of that city. The invention consists of the inserting of "blue glass" in the crown of the hat in order to propagate the growth of the hair.

Two of the most celebrated artists the world has ever known dwelt in the same city. One delighted in delineating beauty in all its graces of tint, form and motion. His portraits were instinct with the charm of physical vigor. The graceful, half-voluptuous outline of form and feature harmonized with delicately-blended tints. On his canvas, the homeliest faces had an almost irresistible charm. The other found pleasure only in depicting weird and gloomy subjects. Above all, did he excel in painting the portraits of the dying. The agonizing death-throe, the ghastly face and form, were all depicted with marvelous fidelity. There existed between these artists the most intense dislike. At length this dislike culminated. The beauty-loving artist had been engaged in painting the portrait of a beautiful woman. Connoisseurs pronounced it the most wonderful piece of art that had ever been produced. His brother artist was jealous of his fame and sought revenge. By bribing the keeper of the studio he gained access to the picture each night. At first he was content to only deaden the brilliancy of the complexion and eyes, efface the bloom from cheek and lip, and paint a shadow on either cheek. Later, his strokes grew bolder and freer, and one morning the artist awoke to find the entire outline of the portrait changed. He could scarcely recognize in the emaciated form and haggard countenance the glowing conception he had embodied. The pallid face and expressionless eyes he had attributed to a lack of genuineness in his materials; but when the outlines were changed he suspected the cause and indignantly dismissed the keeper. What the revengeful artist marred by a few rapid strokes of his skillful brush was only restored by years of patient industry. Reader, need we name the artists—Health, who paints the flowers and "grassy carpet" no less than the human form divine—Disease, the dreaded artist who revels among the ruins both of nature and humanity—and Carelessness, the keeper to whom Health often intrusts his portraits. And is it not the beauty of woman, the most admired of all the works which adorn the studio of Health, that Disease oftenest seeks to mar? The slightest stroke of his brush upon the delicate organization leaves an imprint that requires much skill and patience to efface. Restoration must be prompt. Carelessness must be dismissed. Let suffering women heed the warning ere Disease has marred their chief beauty—Health—beyond reparation. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has been used by thousands of these sufferers, and they are unanimous in their praise of its excellence. If you would be transformed from the pallid, nervous invalid into a happy, vigorous woman, try it.

IS THERE ONE reader of this paper suffering from rheumatism? If so, write to Helphenstine & Bentley, Druggists, Washington, D. C., for a circular of Durang's Rheumatic Remedy. This medicine is taken internally, and will positively cure any case of rheumatism on the face of the green earth.

WE understand that the whooping-cough is quite prevalent in the towns around us; but that no cases have proved fatal. Some families use nothing but Johnson's Anodyne Liniment. Our Doctor, however, says a little ipicac, to produce vomiting, would be an advantage.

THERE are more than one thousand different kinds of pills in the United States. Some of them are worthless and injurious, others are good and beneficial. Old Dr. Parsons invented the best anti-bilious pill we ever saw or heard of. They are now sold under the name of Parsons' Purgative Pills.

SWORN STATEMENT
OF A
BOSTON DRUGGIST.

Gentlemen,—I hereby certify that I have had Catarrh for ten years, and for the last six years have been a terrible sufferer. I was rendered partially deaf, had buzzing in the head, pains across the temples, dizzy spells, weak and painful eyes, swollen and ulcerated tonsils, hard and constant cough, severe pain across the chest, and every indication of consumption. My head ached all the time. The matter accumulated so rapidly in my head and throat that I could not keep them free. Frequently at night I would spring out of bed, it seemed to me, at the point of suffocation. I would then have recourse to every means in my power to dislodge the mucus from my throat and head before being able to sleep again. For a period of six years my tonsils were ulcerated and so much inflamed that I could with difficulty swallow. I finally consulted an eminent surgeon in regard to an operation on them, but at his request postponed it. The constant inflammation and ulceration in my throat, caused by the poisonous matter dropping down from my head, had so irritated and inflamed my lungs that I coughed incessantly,—a deep, hard cough. Meanwhile my system began to show the effects of this disease, so that I lost flesh, grew pale, and showed every symptom of an early death by consumption. When matters had reached this stage, or about six months ago, I began the use of SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE FOR CATARRH. After using the first bottle I began to improve rapidly. The first dose seemed to clear my head as I had not known it to be for years. It seemed gradually to arrest the discharges. It stopped my cough in three days. By using it as a gargle I soon reduced the inflammation and swelling of my tonsils, so that they soon ceased to trouble me. The soreness across my chest disappeared, the buzzing noises in my head ceased, my senses of hearing and of seeing were completely restored, and every symptom of disease that had reduced me to the verge of the grave disappeared by the use of SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE FOR CATARRH.

I have been thus explicit because, as a druggist, I have seen a great deal of suffering from Catarrh, and hope to convince many that this is a great remedy.

I am familiar with the treatment of Catarrh as practised by the best physicians, and have consulted the most eminent about my case. I have used every kind of remedy and apparatus that have appeared during a period of six years past, and have, while following their use, taken great care of my general health, but obtained no relief or encouragement from any of them.

Since curing myself with SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE, I have recommended it in over one hundred cases without a single case of failure, and have in numerous instances received wholesale orders from parties to whom I have sold one bottle. This is the only patent medicine I have ever recommended, never having believed in them before, although constantly engaged in their sale. Very gratefully yours,

BOSTON, Feb. 23, 1876. GEORGE F. DINSMORE.

CITY LIFE.

Prof. Swing on the Folly of Young Men and Women Leaving Their Homes in the Country for Life in the City.

Prof. Swing, of Chicago, has begun, in his paper, the Alliance, the consideration of the fatal attractions of city life for the young men and young women of the country. The vice of city life is what ministers and moralists are accustomed to dwell upon, but lectures and sermons on this phase of the matter are not so apt to discourage the natural tendency of mankind to aggregate in large communities as the dismal outlook of failure, which is the only perspective city life presents to the majority of those who seek it without experience or preparation. Prof. Swing has been wise in recognizing this fact, and by continually pressing it upon his hearers and readers he may make it more effective than whole volumes of abstract moralization. The key to his position may be found in the following paragraph:

> That young men and women are ruined by vice is well known, but a great number are drawn away from some good life pursuit because they would rather drive a stage or feed a horse in a city than do a good year's work on a new farm 100 miles away. There are thousands of young men who are anxious to live where they can wear clean cuffs and nice black boots every day. And then one wants to go to a concert now and then, and to hear the great singers, and actors, and orators who travel along. This is the universal argument. It is often a poor, childish blunder. If the country offers one good labor and pay all these other things can come along rapidly enough. Once a year to the city will give the rural youth all the art, and opera, and drama he will need. A week a year will do, and there then remain fifty-one weeks for country work and country education. Mental luxuries go out to the country man in these days. As men do not need to go to Jerusalem to worship, so neither need they go to a city to find all good. Books go out to the people. Music loves the country too. The society of many country towns is as good as any metropolitan group one can enter.

The longing for city life, says the Chicago Tribune in commenting on the subject, that swells the bosom of nine out of every ten young men and women reared in the country grows out of a misapprehension. It is like the desire of a stage-struck amateur, who sees only the brilliancy of the footlights and the glitter of the tinsel, who hears only the applause of the audience in front, who knows only of the momentary excitement of public life, and has no conception of the bitter trials and the hard work so rarely rewarded with anything but disappointment and discomfiture. The great mass of poverty-stricken clerks and day-laborers, of starving seamstresses and shop-girls, and of the idle and unemployed of both sexes in large cities are those whose youthful training contemplated nothing but plowing the field or milking the cows. They might have been contented—and this is the highest and most lasting happiness—had they not abandoned a peaceful, quiet, rural life for a struggle in a crowded community, where they are brought into competition with skilled hands and superior training. To enter upon the struggle of life in a large city without trade or calling can only be likened to embarking upon a stormy sea in a boat without a rudder. As a rule, death is the only relief in either case. It is not vice alone but failure that threatens, and, though not so immoral, it kills as surely, and drags along a wretched existence without the glamour that vice sometimes provides as a sort of compensation. Happiness, like all other things, is only relative to the condition, and the tastes, inclinations, and temptations that city life develops for those who can never hope to indulge in them only add to the stock of wretchedness instead of the stock of bliss.

But it is not the inexperienced youths alone who suffer from unnatural contact with city life; the city suffers as well. The unemployed classes, the pauper classes, the vicious classes, the bummer classes, are swollen by the aimless and frivolous that are furnished by the rural districts. With millions of rich acres in this broad land, and resources that are as yet limitless and open to strong hands and ready hearts, young men and young women flock to crowded cities to live in squalor, to starve, to steal, to plunder. The mass of foreigners who come to America have been reared to agricultural pursuits, and know nothing else. With land so cheap and fertile as they find it here they could enlarge the patches to which they have been accustomed in their native lands to great, rich farms, and dairies, and plantations, and stock-yards. But they are lured by the ignis fatuus of city life, and relapse into narrow alleys, and dirty hovels, and crowded tenements, and a general condition of squalor and disease. They infest the politics of the day, and acquire all the vices without any of the virtues of self-government. They prostitute themselves to the uses of the demagogue, and degenerate into a sort of political machinery, manipulated for the benefit of public plunderers. They are largely responsible for the abuses of city government, but get small share of the individual benefits that accrue therefrom. The only hope in recurring to the subject is that, by making these and all other people without the education or preparation for combatting with city life on equal terms understand that the suffering more than outweighs the gratification, and that failure is limitless, while success is microscopic, some of them may be deterred in time from rushing into a whirlpool of trials from which not one in a thousand escapes.

A Woman Still.

The Cleveland Leader tells the following pathetic story of mother's love:

A young woman, with draggled dress and a flushed face, with her hair loose over her shoulder, and a hard look in her eyes, followed a burly officer into the Central station just as the clock was on the stroke of midnight.

"What's the matter here?" queried the Lieutenant, looking up as the ill-mated couple came trooping in.

"Same old charge," said the officer; "she's been raising Cain around the hay market."

"You bet your boots I have," said the girl, with a hoarse laugh that showed there was whisky behind it. "I give 'em as good as they sent."

They were leading her into the recording room, when she stopped at the door opening into the Captain's office.

"Whose kid is that?" she asked.

"That? Oh, one that was picked up on the street—lost by somebody."

"Lost, is he? Well, I've found him. Let me alone, will you?"

She pulled away from the officer, and in a moment was on the lounge with the child in her arms, her painted cheeks pressed close to the tear-stains left on the little fellow's face when he had cried himself to sleep. Her hair hung in a veil before them, and hid the guilty and innocent alike from sight.

"I had one like you once," she murmured, after the hush of a moment, "but he died. That was so long ago that I thought I had forgotten it—there has been so much happening since—so much I wish to God had never happened!"

A moment longer and she looked up—as sober as a mother by the hearth-stone. "May I take him in the cell with me?" she asked, in a low and gentle voice.

They said she might, and the poor, forsaken woman sat down on the stone bench with the sleeping child held close to her bosom. The tears that fell from her eyes were as balm to her bruised heart, and the little one lifted her soul to purer heights than it had known for many, many weary days in the past.

"God Pity the Opium-Eater."

One Wdnesday morning, at 6 o'clock, a man was found weltering in gore in one of the closets of the St. James Hotel. He was borne to the hospital, but, ere many squares had been traveled, he breathed his last. The following letter, written only a short time previous to his being found in the agonies of death, told the story:

> My own true name is M. M. Wishard,
> Late Superintendent
> Orphans' Home,
> Knightstown,
> Ind.
> I am paying dear for my sin. Opium is the cause of it all. Write Dr. Hannaman some one, please, when I am gone.
> God only knows how I have fought this terrible habit, but whenever it gets hold of the system it is too late. I am expecting every moment to be arrested and taken to jail, where I shall never come out alive. God pity the opium-eater. Am almost past going now.
> Feb. 14, 1877.

In the inside of the sheet, evidently written while nerving himself to commit suicide, were the following:

> Oh! that I had been wise in the day of this visitation. I have a faint hope of forgiveness. I then began to fight it with the desperation that almost crazed me, and, when nearly well, would become discouraged and go back again. My dear family is my regret. Oh! that I had been wise in time. No man ever had a dearer family than I had. A better wife and children no man ever saw. How cruel I have been. If through Jesus' blood. Although I have been a great sinner, I was so much intoxicated by opium that I thought I was a Christian, but, alas, alas, when too late, I fear I find I was not. The opium habit was contracted more than ten years ago, though not confirmed until about eight years since. I live, of which I have little hope, I would cheerfully serve them. I fear my wife and little ones are dead or insane. God knows I cannot recall my life.

The hotel employes say that at 6 o'clock, with erect bearing and deliberate movements, he entered the hotel and straightway sought the closet. A knife and a pair of surgical scissors convey the rest of the chapter. He first cut his throat with a penknife, and then, inserting the scissors into the wound, tried to sever the main artery, but, before he accomplished his purpose, he fell exhausted to the floor.—New Orleans Times.

A Rich Man's Heirs.

More work for the lawyers, over the will of Isaac M. Singer. Some of the heirs are not satisfied with their allowance out of the estate. Singer left altogether about $4,000,000 to be divided among his several families (he was married five or six times), and among the many heirs, it appears, there are some who think they were born to purple and fine linen. One branch, named Mathews, consists of mother, two daughters and one son, the children all grown up. Their shares of the great estate were $200,000 each. But the bequests are so tied up that only an allowance out of them can be had. This does not suit their ideas at all, so the mother is trying to have the allowance increased. She thinks each ought to get $500 a month. They cannot possibly live up to their position and expectations with less. They must really have $500 a month each, at least, or there will be hardship and, possibly, loss of caste. Another heir, a young married woman named Foster, who has been receiving $500 a month out of the estate, now wants $1,000. She also wants $2,500 for a suitable turnout. A beggarly $500 a month can't begin to support her in the way she ought to live. Singer himself lived in magnificent style in England and France for some years before his death, and why should not his heirs, who never helped him to earn a dollar of the great fortune he left behind, live just as luxuriously as he did? One of Mrs. Mathews' reasons for demanding $500 a month for her son is that he wants to travel. Singer traveled a good deal in his early days on much less than that. He and his wife made the rounds of the country with cheap shows and third-class theatrical companies, and did not see $500 in a year. But things are a good deal changed since that time, and rich men's heirs have mighty big notions nowadays.

A Boy of Mettle.

On Wednesday afternoon, in Capp street, a lady and child had just taken their seats in a buggy, to which two horses were harnessed, when the animals took fright and went down the street at full speed. The lines had fallen over the dashboard, and the lady had no means of controlling the team, but she had presence of mind enough to retain her seat and tightly grasp the child. Several attempts were made by persons on the street to stop the runaways, but they only served to increase the speed of the frightened horses. At length a boy on horseback appeared on the scene and galloped after the fugitives. He headed them at the corner of Fourteenth and Capp streets, after they had cleared two or three blocks, and, by dexterous handling of his own horse, managed to seize the lines of the runaway team and bring them to a standstill. As may be imagined, the lady was greatly agitated by the adventure, but was not too overcome to speak her gratitude to her deliverer. The name of the little hero is John Flynn. He is about 12 or 13 years of age, and is said to have stopped other runaways in much the same way.—San Francisco Call.

THE TELEPURP.

Brand-New Invention—How a Yaller Dog was Sent Over the Wires.

[From the Operator.]

A good story comes from Norwalk, Ct. One day last week a gaunt, slab-sided chap, with particles of hay-seed on his coat and in his tow-colored hair, stepped up to the telegraph office at the railroad depot and asked if the boss was in. The operator assured him that he was, and his rural friend went on to relate that he lived up in Danbury, had come down from there that morning, and intended bringing his brother's dog, which a man in Norwich wanted to buy, but had forgotten it, and wanted to know if the dog could be sent down from there by telegraph. The man of lightning, seeing a good chance for a little fun, at once answered:

"Certainly, sir; that is a matter of daily occurrence. All that is necessary for you to do is to give me a description of the dog, so that no mistake can be made; call again in about half an hour, and the dog will be here."

"It is a yellow dog, with small ears, and is about so high," said the Granger, placing his hand eighteen inches from the floor. He then took his departure with the remark that he would call again soon. The operator then sent his messenger boy to look for a dog as near the description as possible, which he soon succeeded in finding. It was at once brought to the office, and secured to the operator's desk by means of a piece of telegraph wire. After a little coaxing the dog was made to lie quietly down, and everything was in readiness for our rural friend. Punctual to the time appointed he made his appearance, and asked if the dog had come.

"I will see," said the operator, and stepping up to the instrument he tapped a few times on the key, at the same time, inserting his leg under the desk, he managed to step on the dog's toes, which caused the canine to yelp. "Ah! he's coming," said the operator, and then, tapping more furiously on the key, he at the same time kicked the dog clean from under the table, who, not relishing this kind of treatment, barked furiously, and ran around the office with the wire attached to his neck. "Fifty cents, sir," said the operator, turning around to the countryman. "Uncommon nice dog, must be worth $50; but he is the hardest dog I ever received over the wires; he is so muscular, you see, that he broke the wire, in fact a piece of it is now attached to his neck, which he broke off."

During the whole of this operation the countryman gazed on the operator with eyes wide open and full of surprise; but when the dog came from under the table and was seen by the countryman, that was the culminating point, and he was struck with amazement. After looking at the dog a moment or so, he said, "Say, mister, he ain't so big as he was, and he is darker, how is that?"

"Oh! that is easily explained," said the operator; "you see the chemicals employed in making electricity of course darken his original color, and the velocity with which he passed over the wire caused him to contract in size; but after you expose him to the air for a short time he will soon assume his original size and color."

"Du tell," said the countryman, and, after placing 50 cents on the counter, he picked up the dog, and walked out of the office, remarking that "the man who invented them telegraphs must be a very knowledgable man."

The Slave-Trade.

It will be astounding news to many American Christians that the slave-trade is still carried on to such an extent as to involve the loss, annually, of at least 500,000 lives. Such, we are assured by the Missionary News, is the fact. From the same source we learn that while this large number die or are massacred in this inhuman traffic, only 70,000 Africans reach the coast and become slaves. The News states that there are five routes by which slaves are taken from Central Africa: "1. Through the Sahara desert to Tunis and Morocco. 2. Down the Nile, via Khartoum, into Egypt. 3. Down the Nile, turning off before reaching Khartoum, for the seaports on the Red sea. 4. Direct to the Zanzibar coast, for Zanzibar, Pemba, etc. 5. Two routes from Lake N'yassa to the Mozambique coast, for Madagascar and the North." And it add "The treaties with Zanzibar do no really prevent the traffic, as the Seyid has no power to enforce these treaties. The English cruisers capture only a fraction of the dhows engaged by the Arabs in the slave-trade. It has now become necessary to seek directly, by all justifiable means, to abolish slavery in Egypt, Turkey, Persia, Zanzibar, Madagascar, Tunis, Morocco, Cuba and Brazil."

Qualities of Fire Wood.

It is a great convenience to know the comparative value of different kinds of wood for fuel. Shell-bark hickory is regarded as the highest standard of our forest trees, and calling that 100, other trees will compare with it for real value as fuel for house purposes as follows:

Shellbark hickory	100	Yellow oak	60
Pignut hickory	95	Hard maple	59
White oak	84	White elm	58
White ash	77	Red cedar	56
Dogwood	75	Wild cherry	55
Scrub oak	73	Yellow pine	54
White hazel	72	Chestnut	52
Apple tree	70	Yellow poplar	51
Red oak	69	Butternut	43
White beech	65	White birch	43
Black walnut	65	White pine	30
Black birch	62

It is worth bearing in mind that in woods of the same species there is a great difference, according to the soil on which they grow. A tree that grows on a wet, low, rich ground will be less solid and less durable for fuel, and therefore of a less value than a tree of the same kind that grows on a dry and poorer soil. To the ordinary purchaser, oak is oak, and pine is pine, but for home use the tree grown on dry upland and standing apart from others is worth a great deal more.—Our Home Journal.

Prof. Fritz, of Zurich, has recently shown, from a comparison of annual meteorological statistics, that the years distinguished by a maximum of solar spots coincide very closely with those years marked by exceptionally severe hail-storms, and an unusual average height of large rivers. The special periods occur at intervals of eleven years, and the law is in accordance with observations made during the past century in all latitudes.

AUBURN, INDIANA, MAR. 8, 1877

OBITUARY.

LIBERTY IS DEAD.

The Funeral took place at Washington on Monday.

Weep Freemen, and let all free citizens of a great nation mourn, raise the Stars and Stripes, the emblem of the deceased Libery to half-mast, for the death knell of the once glorious Republic has been sounded. Let us mourn for her murdered corpse as for a sister, a mother; and when the flowers bloom, strew her grave with roses. Let a nation mourn, for liberty has been foully murdered by red-handed ruffians and thieves while the chief of the gang holds the golden septer in brazen defiance of the American Nation.

NEIGHBORHOOD NEWS.

AUBURN JUNCTION.

School closed last Monday for a months vacation.

Tramps are becoming numerous, and troublesome.

Loveland J. C. flew through the Junction a p. d. q. trip to Garrett.

It is evident that our supply of gin mills is in excess of the demand.

Mr. Samuel Link is lying dagerously ill at his residence just west of town.

Where, Oh, where are the little birds who sang so sweetly a few weeks since?

We are to have a lumber yard at this point during the coming building season.

Smiths beer garden will soon be in full blast with brass band accompainments.

Mrs. Wherrett has recovered her usal health much to the gratification of her many friends.

The boys have paid up their little election bets and will try to get even on "pedro" or seven up.

The route agents on the different lines running through here are in high glee over the result of the election.

The Sheriff or his deputies are around quite frequently of late, on the look-out for thieves &c. Wonder if we hadn't better start him after our chicken theif.

Judge Picker is still on deck. The Judge says it was p. d. c. last Sunday.

It is rumored that Davis Castle is about to resume as a hotel and boarding house. Should such be the case, look out for falling weather, (stones.)

Quite number of our citizens were regular attendants at court last week because of an alleged riot said to have occurred at one of the grog shops at Auburn some time time since. They were all acquitted.

Mr. Wash Link and family have removed to Cherubusco, where they have united with John Link, in engineering the principal hash factory of that village. The union of these "Links" both big and little, form quite a "chain."

Some sacrilligious cuss had the audacity to rob the priest at Auburn, of some of his worldly possessions on last Sabbath, consequently every one who came toward the Junction on that day was track by some members of the good Fathers' flock for the robber. Many ludicrous and embarrassing explanations was caused thereby. X.

SPENCERVILLE.

The revival meetings still continue at the M. E. Church.

Professor Allen and wife spent Sabbath with friends in town.

Rev. Errick closed his meetings at Spencerville church last week.

Sol Barney has a new boarder quite dimenative in size; it is a gal this time

Rev. Lancaster is still protracting his meetings at Bear Creek church. Many have been converted and still they come.

Mrs. David Butler, an aged lady, living half a mile south of Spencerville, died at ten o'clock Sunday evening. Daniel Butler and wife were among the first settlers on the St. Joe River. Mr. Butler is also in feeble health.

LA OTTO.

She is gone, and Stephen refuses to be comforted.

Preaching at Lee Chapel next Sunday morning and evening.

Z. A. Young is about to erect a large furniture room on corner of Main and Sycamore streets.

Charley Bruce, Jr., was seen in La Otto the other day, the same loquacous Charley as in days gone by. "Shake old man."

Dr. Shepard, formerly of this place, has gone where the woodbine twineth, at "Dutch Rige" to locate. The doctor is a good medicine man, and we recommend him as a No. 1 physician.

The erratic Brown, the "novus homo" of La Otto has left us, gone like a dream, no more to gladden our hearts; oh, Brownie, how could you, you naughty man.

We droped in at Dr. Bowkers office and viewed his large and varied collection of stuffed birds and animals. The doctor proves himself quite a taxidermist. Persons bringing birds or animals of any species not contained in his collection, to his office will be liberally compensated for their trouble.

Taylor has discovered that "Theophilus" and William are the same person, ha, ha, ha. Go for William, Doctor, he is the "sinner;" don't let up but hang on with the tenacity of a [illegible] bull pup. Oh, my goodness, Doctor, sound the news to the sufferers of La Otto and vicinity; let every town and hamlet know who the wretch is that "gives them away," spare him not, but let him know and feel the immensity of his crime. Be ye not "bull-dozed," neither "intimidated" by "Theophilus," that lump of iniquity. dear Doctor, and the blessings of the long suffering and much tried people of this "burg" will be yours. Oh, my Saviour, Doctor, unfold your tale that "Theophilus," like the wicked, he shall flee when no man pursueth.

CEDAR CREEK.

Our justice John H——y thinks he can do business on the square now. Two dollars cost is all it has cost him yet.

Our friend J. L——g, says that Henry A. Miller is not ghost enough to keep him from securing his prize. He says he will try it again the night of the twelfth of April. Look out for a circulation of silver.

The meeting at this place has been very successful. It has been said by some that the minister holding the Cedar Creek meeting is not authorized to preach the gospel by an ecclesiasticle appointment. We here give his own answer; he says, "my commission is from God: I also hold a printed license which all can read." The servants of the devil do falsly attack the ministry.

A. J. W.

Very respectfully, C. C. POST.
State Grange Sec'y Indianopolis.

The sad news come that the inaugural ball was dispensed with this season. The reason, perhaps, is that the ceremonies attending the fraudulent president's inauguration would resemble the gloomy surroundings of a funeral rather than the festive attendants of a great victory. Pensylvania avenue should be draped in mourning, and the bells of Washington city might toll forth the gloomy echoes of a death knell.

In an eloquent argument before the court, W. L. Penfield, Esq., used the following language: "That the joint commission had decided that fraud would not set aside a decree, but that decision could not be sustained by law, precedent or practice. That no court or government could stand which recognized such principles. That fraud vitiates all transactions." Does not this sentiment live and burn in the bones of every patriot in this broad land or should it not?

Perhaps it is not known to many in Auburn that we have a young ladies debating society, but such is the case. At their meeting Saturday night the following questions were debated: Resolved, that "tilters are more beneficial than stripped stockings." If we were to decide the above questions, we would be compelled to decide in the negative, for in examining Webster we find that a tilter is one who "tilts" which we think is as injurious to the health as jumping the rope.

It was Saturday night when it was "done," and the joke was, that none were aware of anything of the kind till all was over, as the only persons present present were the groom and bride, T. H. Leasure and Miss Nettie Shaw, Rev. Henry Johnson, who officiated L. H. Jackman and wife, Jas. V. Hazzard and wife and Frank Zimmerman, and Tommy got his "Pshaw" and Nettie took her "Leasure." We didn't get any of the cake, but that cigar smoked well. It is our wish that they may live long and have lots of Leasure's time to spare for genial bliss.

G. H. Forkner & Co. from Hagrestown Wayne county, Indiana, have bought the stock of goods owned by J. R. Lanning, and the invoice of the same is now being made. The store under the new management, will be opened next week. The parties have bought this store with the intention of making Auburn their permanent business point. They will make a grand clearance sale for thirty days, preparetory to bringing on from New York city, the largest and best assorted stock of goods ever brought to DeKalb county. We desire in this connection to call attention to the fact that in order to make Auburn a first class point for business, that we must support one another in business, and patronize home institutions. Our merchants keep as good goods as can be bought in Fort Wayne, and sell them as cheap. Then why not buy at home, and save railroad fare and sustain our own business institutions. The new establishment will be known as the New York Store.

One of the boldest burglaries ever known in Auburn, was prepetrated last Sunday The circumstances are about as follows: Last Sabbath, while Father Young was celebrating mass, some rascal entered his house and stole his overcoat, pants, vest, new boots, watch guard and six dollars in money, all amounting to about $115. Nothing could be learned as the whereabouts of the thief, but it is rumored that a man answering his discription, was seen at the Junction about 3 p. m. the same day, and again between Auburn and Avilla Monday morning. It seems strange he should in broad day be able to make way with these goods and not be apprehended.

We hear of a little dissatisfaction in the singing of the Presbyterian choir. It is said that their congregational hymns are all new and difficult selections, making it almost impossible for the audience to participate in singing, and that their voluntaries are not executed in the best manner. There are a large number who attend church that love to sing and take their book with them for that purpose and it is no doubt a little discouraging to have the choir select pieces to suit their own taste, and the congregation with their books under their arms, listen to the music of the singers. There is nothing so grand and melodious in the exercises on the Sabbath day, as to hear the whole congregation send forth their voices in the good old songs. "Jesus sought me when a stranger," "Nearer my God to thee," etc.—Republican.

As regards to the above slur on the choir, there is no doubt but the "editors tea was too strong," and his brain whirled while writing it, so he must not be held responsible by the good citizens of Auburn for what he says. Hank, if you are bound to throw out these little "spite slurs" on us, simply because we have assumed the place which you might have held as long as you wished, why spit them out, but don't abuse the whole choir in order to cut one. If you would attend church, say once in a month, you might perhaps be able to speak the truth a little better. We do not hesitate to say that the choir have passed a resolution of indignation, feeling themselves insulted in the above, and unanimously condemn the article and the author. Sober up Hank, and get your ideas together, that you may be able to have some truth in your "spite slurs."

Horse Thieves.

Last Thursday about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, a stranger went to H. Parents livery barn and hired a rig to go to Waterloo, as he said, to see his brother, stating he would be back about six or eight o'clock that evening. Mr. Parent thinking nothing wrong, let him have one of his best single horses and best top buggy. At about 7 o'clock it began to rain pretty hard, nothing was thought about the man not returning at the stated time, until 4 o'clock the next morning, when a couple of men arrived from Antwerp, looking for a double team that had been stolen from the livery there in the same manner, and the discription of the man led Mr. Parent to believe he had hired his rig to the same person and immediately started in pursuit. The team belonging to the Antwerp party were found at daylight next morning hitched to a tree on the corner of Fourth and Jackson streets having stood out in the rain all night.

Mr. Parent proceeded to Waterloo, got some help, and started north on the trail of the thief. It seems there is a gang somewhere north of here, for on the same night a horse and carriage was stolen from the livery at Lagrange, and a double team from the livery at Fremont, Ind., for the next morning the thieves met above Waterloo and changed horses, in order to break the description. While in the attempt of changing, when the horses were unhitched, the wind which was blowing rather strong, blew a forked branch off of a tree where they stood, one fork striking the hind end of the Lagrange buggy and badly demoralized it, the other fork striking immediately in front of Mr. Parents horse, frightening him in such a manner as to cause him to break loose and run away, and did not hold up till he was stopped at Waterloo and delivered to Mr. Parent. The thieves then hitched the Lagrange horse to Mr. Parent's buggy and off they went and have so far eluded those in search of them. If they are caught, they ought to be made an example of.

Hayes took the oath of office secretly Sunday night.

We were mistaken in stating that Miss Littlefield had withdrawn from the Presbyterian choir. We received our information from W. E. Peterson, Esq., at the birth-day dinner in honor of our six foot brother, and we thought Walt was responsible.—Republican.

We have never attended a birth-day dinner given in honor of any brother of Mr. Weamer, but did attend one in honor of the six foot brother of Hank Little. The above is conclusive evidence that Hank is editor of the Republican. Why don't Weamer take his name off of the head of the editoral column. Further, with "big" brother for proof, we positively deny ever making any statement, or even did not mention the name of Miss Littlefield while at the dinner; anything to get out, Hank, be the way ever so small, you can squeeze through.

On Christmas day an aspiring German won for himself fame as an industrious beer drinker. Some time since a question having arisen as to the capacity of this individual, he set all doubts forever at rest by drinking the contents of a large beer keg within the prescribed time of three hours. Prior to undertaking this feat he ate a half-pound of newly made butter, and while engaged in the act of drinking was reclining in a bath tub filled with luke-warm water. After drinking the last glass he was, to all appearance, as sober as when he commenced the task. There are 100 glasses of lager in a keg.—[Hartford Post.

THE EAST.

Douglas Walker, of New York city, has been sentenced to sixty days in the penitentiary for swindling Thomas T. Clark.

A heavy robbery occurred in Boston a few days ago. A tin box containing stocks and bonds of the value of $[illegible] was stolen from the residence of Mr. J. C. Brigham. The property belonged to the estate of J. H. Dexter, of which Mr. Brigham was administrator.... The will of the late Commodore Vanderbilt was offered for probate before the Surrogate's Court, New York, the other day. Protests were entered by counsel for Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., and other disappointed relatives of the deceased millionaire. The counsel of the contestants consists of Hon. Jere S. Black, David Dudley Field, Scott Lord and Ethan Allen. The main ground of objection urged is undue influence, but it is said that some additional allegations of a startling nature will be presented. The amount of property involved covers that in the will, together with that deeded to W. H. Vanderbilt before the Commodore's death, and aggregates very nearly $100,000,000 in value. This fight over the dead Commodore's money-bags promises to be the biggest kind of a big bonanza to the lawyers.

THE WEST.

The miners in the Black Hills are becoming alarmed at the threatening attitude of the hostile Indians. A band of savages recently made a night attack on Spearfish City, a small mining town near Deadwood. About a hundred shots were exchanged, but no miners were injured, owing to the darkness. Parties of Indians had been seen in other sections of the Hills.

Chicago's last sensation is the defalcation of Gen. McArthur, for several years Postmaster at that city. His "irregularities" amount to about $50,000. McArthur has gone into bankruptcy, and made the Government a preferred creditor, which will probably secure it against loss.

Fox's American Theater, in Philadelphia, has been destroyed by fire. It had a seating capacity of 3,000.

Jack McCall, who, some months ago, at Deadwood, killed John B. Hickok, better known as "Wild Bill," was executed at Yankton, Dakota, on the 1st of March.... The Harding Paper Mills, at Franklin, Ohio, have been destroyed by fire. Loss, $200,000.

THE SOUTH.

President Grant having prohibited a military parade in Columbia, S. C., on Washington's birthday anniversary, the day in that city exhibited all the quietness of the Sabbath. Business was wholly suspended, and the flags on the public buildings were placed at half-mast.

In the Nicholls Legislature, at New Orleans, a resolution has been adopted declaring that under no circumstances will the people of Louisiana pay tribute to any other than the Nicholls Government, and that "any attempt to gather taxes by other authority will not only prove abortive, but lead to lamentable civil strife." Gov. Nicholls has appointed tax collectors in nearly all the parishes of the State.

According to the report of the Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, the trade of Memphis during 1876 was as follows: Value of cotton receipts, $27,225,000; value of general merchandise receipts, $42,472,124; product of home manufactures, $5,300,869; total yearly business, $74,997,993.

Ex-Gov. Joseph Johnston, of Virginia, died last week in the 92d year of his age.... Gov. Nicholls has issued a proclamation convening an extra session of the Louisiana Legislature, required in view of the condition of public affairs, and for purposes of indispensable legislation, specifying education, appropriation, revenue, levees, election, registration, city and parochial affairs, and the election of United States Senator.... Fears are entertained by Gov. Packard of an attempt on the part of the Nicholls Government to seize the State House, and he has made a request on President Grant for arms. The President replied, there was no law under which he could comply with the request, but that the troops would remain to preserve peace.

There is trouble growing out of the dual governments in South Carolina. "A store," says a Charleston telegram, "was robbed at Waterboro, Colleton county. A Hampton Trial Justice, failing to secure one of the alleged thieves, called upon the Sheriff's posse, which was also resisted, and the Sheriff, after consultation with Gov. Hampton, summoned 100 men to arrest the thief and his friends. The rioters were found in force, but, when charged by the posse, fled without firing a shot. About twenty of them were captured with muskets in their hands, and were sent to jail."

POLITICAL.

Frank W. Palmer, recently editor of the Inter-Ocean, has been appointed to succeed Gen. McArthur as Postmaster at Chicago.

WASHINGTON.

The President has nominated James A. Williamson, of Iowa, Commissioner of the District of Columbia in place of James H. Ketchum, resigned.

A Washington dispatch says: "The Postmaster General has received during the past week a number of newspaper protests against the construction of the Postal law of 1874, so far as it relates to the postage on back numbers of newspapers and periodicals mailed to subscribers. The department has ruled that subscribers can receive all the back numbers of the volume for which they subscribed at the subscription rates of postage, but that numbers back of that volume must pay book rates.

The Acting Secretary of the Treasury has issued the fortieth call for the redemption of 5-20 bonds of 1865, May and November. The call is for $10,000,000, of which $7,000,000 are coupon and $3,000,000 registered bonds. The principal and interest will be paid at the treasury on and after the 28th of May next, and the interest will cease on that day. The following are the descriptions of the bonds: Coupon bonds, $500, No. 35,801 to 37,800, both inclusive; $1,000, No. 79,000 to 80,000, both inclusive. Registered bonds, $50, No. 451 to 480, both inclusive; $100, No. 5,251 to 6,250, both inclusive; $500, No. 3,801 to 3,950, both inclusive; $1,000, No. 14,301 to 14,800, both inclusive; $5,000, No. 5,351 to 5,831, both inclusive; $10,000, No. 9,751 to 10,083, both inclusive.

GENERAL.

The whole Government machinery of Nova Scotia has been wiped out of existence by the discovery that the great seal of the province in use was the one rendered worthless by the Queen's command nine years ago. It has been therefore decided that all legislation, money grants, marriage licenses, and in fact everything done by Government authority, since 1868, was null and void. Imperial legislation is necessary to set the matter right, and the Halifax people are naturally full of excitement.... Gen. Andrew Denison, Postmaster at Baltimore for eight years, was found dead in his bed a few mornings since.... The notorious Gen. Cortinas has been arrested at Matimoras, Mexico, and placed in the military prison. It is believed that he will be court-martialed and shot for not obeying the order of President Diaz to present himself at the City of Mexico to answer for his conduct on the frontier for the past ten months. .... The Presidential election in Mexico has resulted in the success of Diaz.

Hon. R. B. Hayes left Columbus, Ohio, for Washington on the afternoon of Thursday, March 1, by way of Pittsburgh and Harrisburg, and arrived at the national capital the following day. He was accompanied by his family, consisting of his wife, two sons and a daughter, and a large party of gentlemen and ladies from different points in Ohio.

An important decision, sustaining the so-called Granger law of Illinois, fixing the maximum of railroad charges, has just been rendered by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington. The case was that of Munn & Scott vs. The People of the State of Illinois. The court decided that the law was constitutional, and that there was no error in the judgment.

RECEPTION TO GOV. HAYES.

The citizens of Columbus, Ohio, without distinction of party, tendered a farewell reception to Hon. R. B. Hayes, on the eve of his departure for Washington, at which there was much hand-shaking and speech-making. Gov. Hayes spoke as follows: "Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen—I shall make no attempt to describe what I have felt during the progress of this reception, nor what I feel now that it is drawing to a close. I wish in the simplest way, and with the fewest words, to thank the citizens of Columbus and the members of the General Assembly, the State officers, and the people of Ohio who have taken part in it, for their very great kindness to me and my family on this and many other occasions. The city of Columbus and its people have very many and great claims to our affection and gratitude. It is more than forty years since I became acquainted in boyhood with Columbus, and from that day to this many of my most intimate friends have been among its citizens. Many are gone. I look in vain among those we have met this evening for some who were once numbered with my most familiar acquaintances. A few are here whose acquaintance I made during that first well-remembered year of the cholera, the year 1833. Among these are the Chairman of your Executive Committee, Mr. William Deshler, and I then saw for the first time his older brothers, but very many of my early friends of Columbus are gone. Among those I knew, and remember well for their friendliness to me as a boy, and who are no longer living, are such well-known citizens of earlier days in this city as Joseph Ridgeway, Sr., Joseph Ridgeway, Jr., Samuel Medary, Alfred Kelly, Gustavus Swan, Dr. J. G. Jones, John Noble, M. J. Gilbert, and many who were nearer my own age, such as Thomas Sparrow Fitch, James Matthews, Albert B. Buttles, and Dr. Douglass Case, with whom I was on terms of intimate friendship. We are reminded by the absence of those friends of the changes we must expect in the years that are before us. As for myself and my family, we go, perhaps to return in a few days to occupy our accustomed place in this community. Possibly we go to other scenes and duties not to meet you again as fellow-citizens of Columbus. In that event I wish to say, as Mr. Lincoln said on parting with his friends at Springfield sixteen years ago, that I trust you will pray that I may have that divine assistance and guidance without which I cannot succeed, and with which I cannot fail.

THE OREGON DECISION.

The following is an abstract of the report of the majority of the Electoral Tribunal in the case of Oregon: "The Electoral Commission, having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of the State of Oregon, and certain papers accompanying the same, and objections thereto, report that it has duly considered the same, and has decided and does hereby decide that the votes of W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright and J. W. Watts, the persons named in the certificate of the Secretary of State of Oregon as the persons receiving the highest number of votes for Presidential electors, are the votes provided for by the constitution, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as testified to in the certificate of said electors, namely, three votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, for President, and three votes for William A. Wheeler for Vice President. The report further sets forth that the election of Watts by the other two members of the Electoral College was in accordance with the constitution and laws of Oregon. The grounds for this decision, so far as they concern the eligibility of Watts, are substantially that it is competent to go behind the certificate of the Governor so far as the same is not founded upon the action of the canvassing or returning authority provided for by the laws of the State, which authority in the case of Oregon is held to be the Secretary of State. The report also takes the ground that it is not essential to show that an elector was eligible on the 7th of November, provided it be shown that he was eligible when he cast his vote in the Electoral College, and the fact appears that the alleged ineligible elector, Watts, was chosen to fill a vacancy caused by his own absence from the Electoral College, and that he was not ineligible at the time he cast his vote. The report is signed by Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton and Strong.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA DECISION.

The report of the Electoral Commission to the two houses of Congress, giving the grounds on which it reached its decision, in the South Carolina case, is signed by Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton and Strong. It reads as follows:

The Electoral Commission having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates and papers accompanying the same of the electoral vote from the State of South Carolina, and the objections thereto, reports that it has duly considered the same, and has by a majority of votes decided and does hereby decide that the votes of C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, W. B. Nash, William Cook and William F. Meyers, named in the certificate of Gov. Chamberlain, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by certificates submitted to the commission as aforesaid, and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the constitution of the United States, and the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely: Seven votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and seven votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice President. The commission, by a majority of votes, decides and reports that the seven persons first before named were duly appointed electors in and for said State of South Carolina. The brief ground of this decision is, that it appears, upon such evidence as by the constitution and law creating this commission is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the before-mentioned electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such electors of President and Vice President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, 1877, of the State of South Carolina, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the constitution of the United States and the law, and the commission has by a majority of votes decided that it is not competent under the constitution and law to go into the evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the Governor of the State on and according to the determination of the appointment by the returning officers for elections in said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, or that the determination of said returning officers was not in accordance with the truth and fact, the commission by majority of votes being of opinion that it is not within the jurisdiction of the two houses of Congress assembled to count the votes for President and Vice President to enter upon the trial of such question.

THE ELECTORAL TRIBUNAL.

Friday, Feb. 23.—The Electoral Commission was in secret consultation on the Oregon case from 10:30 to 3 o'clock, at which hour the arbitrators repaired to Senator Thurman's residence, that gentleman being confined to his bed, where he remained during the proceedings of the commission. A vote was then taken on the following propositions, which had been informally submitted and discussed, but not voted upon, during the day's session. By Senator Edmunds: "Resolved, That the certificate signed by E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker, purporting to cast the electoral vote of the State of Oregon, does not contain or certify the constitutional votes to which said State is entitled." Justice Field offered the following as a substitute: "Whereas, J. W. Watts, designated in certificate No. 1 as an elector of the State of Oregon for President and Vice President, on the day of the election, viz.: the 7th day of November, 1876, held an office of trust and profit under the United States; therefore, Resolved, That said J. W. Watts was then ineligible to the office of elector within the express terms of the constitution." Rejected—yeas, 7; nays, 8, as follows: Yeas—Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, Thurman—7. Nays—Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, Strong—8. Justice Field then submitted a resolution to the effect that Odell and Cartwright were the only persons chosen electors in Oregon. This was rejected by the same vote—7 to 8. Justice Field offered still another resolution, "that the attempted re-election of a third elector by the two persons chosen was inoperative and void." Rejected—7 to 8, as above. Mr. Bayard offered a proposition to the effect "that the votes of Odell and Cartwright were the only votes provided for by the constitution, there having been a failure to appoint a third elector in accordance with the constitution and laws of the United States and laws of the State of Oregon, and that these two votes should be counted, and none others from the State of Oregon." Rejected—yeas, 7; nays, 8, as before. A vote was then taken on Mr. Edmunds' original proposition, and it was adopted—yeas, 15; nays, none. Mr. Morton then offered the following: "Resolved, That W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts, the persons named as electors in certificate No. 1, are the lawful electors of the State of Oregon, and that their votes are the votes provided for by the constitution of the United States, and should be counted for President and Vice President of the United States." Mr. Hunton moved to strike out the name of J. W. Watts. Disagreed to—yeas, 7; nays, 8. Mr. Morton's resolution was then adopted—yeas, 8; nays, 7, as follows: Yeas—Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, Strong—8. Nays—Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, Thurman—7. The decision of the commission was then drawn up and signed by the eight members voting in the affirmative. On motion of Mr. Morton, the injunction of secrecy upon the acts and proceedings of the commission, except as regards their report to the joint session of Congress, was removed, and the commission adjourned.

Monday, Feb. 26.—The Electoral Commission reassembled at half-past 6, immediately after the two houses separated, all the members present, Mr. Kernan, successor to Senator Thurman, taking his seat for the first time. The papers referred to the commission by the two houses in joint session were read by the Secretary. In response to inquiry as to who appeared as the objectors, Mr. Hurd announced that Mr. Cochrane and himself would appear as objectors to certificate No. 1. Mr. Lawrence said Senator Christiancy and himself would appear for objectors to certificate No. 2. Senator Christiancy said he appeared for the objectors, but they did not propose to occupy the whole time allowed them. In response to another inquiry as to who would appear as counsel, Mr. Hurd said he was not prepared to state at this time, but would announce counsel to the commission to-morrow morning. Mr. Matthews stated that Mr. Shellabarger and himself would appear in favor of certificate No. 1.... Adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 27.—The commission met at 10 o'clock a. m., and the South Carolina case was at once taken up. Mr. Hurd stated that no counsel would appear for the objectors to certificate No. 1 (the Republican certificate), and then submitted his reasons why the commission should reject that certificate. When Mr. Hurd had finished, Mr. Cochrane stated that Judge Black and Mr. Blair would appear as counsel for the objectors to certificate No. 1. They had been uncertain whether they could attend, but were now present. Mr. Cochrane then submitted certain proffers of proof, which he proposed to make good. Mr. Lawrence followed in an argument for the Hayes objectors. Senator Christiancy waived his right to be heard as an objector, and Mr. Blair, for the Democrats, addressed the court. He said they would offer to prove that, owing to violence and intimidation and the presence of United States troops on the day of election, there was no full and fair election by the people; that there was no registration of voters in the State, which was a palpable violation of the constitution; and that the use of the military in the State was alone sufficient ground for throwing aside the vote of South Carolina. Judge Black closed the argument on behalf of the Democrats, and the commission went into secret session. Mr. Morton submitted the following:

That it is not competent for the two houses assembled for the purpose of counting the votes for President and Vice President to inquire by evidence whether a State regularly represented in the two houses of Congress, and recognized as a State of the United States by the other departments of the Government, has a government republican in form.

Resolved, That while the existence of public disturbance and anarchy in any State, to such an extent as to make it impossible for the State to exercise its right to appoint electors of President and Vice President, and to express its will in that behalf, is sufficient cause for rejecting any electoral votes purporting to be the votes of electors appointed thereby, yet that when a State is regularly represented as a State in the Congress of the United States, and is recognized as a State by the other departments of the Government, and has a government republican in form, and does appoint electors in the manner prescribed by the Legislature thereof, evidence cannot be received by the two houses of Congress assembled to count the votes for President and Vice President as aforesaid to show that disturbances existed at the time of the election which may have interfered to a greater or less extent with the freedom of election at the polls in said State.

Resolved, That it is not competent for the two houses of Congress, when assembled to count the votes for President and Vice President, to take evidence to inquire into the regularity of the action of the President of the United States in sending a military force into any State for the preservation of order or suppression of insurrection and domestic violence, in order by such proof to lay a ground for rejecting the electoral vote of such State.

Resolved, That, in view of the propositions contained in the three foregoing resolutions, the evidence offered to show that the State of South Carolina at the late election did not have a republican form of government, and the evidence offered on the subject of disorder and violence, and the presence of troops in said State during said election is not competent, but that notwithstanding the offer of such evidence the electoral votes of the State of South Carolina ought to be received and counted, if not objectionable on other grounds.

Resolved, That the other objections to certificate No. 1 show no valid cause for rejecting the same.

Mr. Field offered a substitute to the effect that evidence is admissible to show that the military and Deputy United States Marshals were stationed at the various polling places in South Carolina, thereby interfering with the free and full exercise of the right of suffrage. This was rejected by a strict party vote—yeas, 7; nays, 8. Mr. Morton's resolutions were then adopted—8 to 7. A resolution was then offered by Mr. Frelinghuysen that the Tilden electors are not the lawful electors of South Carolina. Unanimously adopted. Mr. Morton offered a resolution that the persons named in certificate No. 1 (Hayes electors) are the lawful electors of South Carolina, and that they be counted as such. Adopted—yeas, 8; nays, 7.

A resolution returning thanks to Justice Clifford for the ability, impartiality and urbanity with which he has presided over the deliberations of the commission was offered by Mr. Morton and unanimously adopted.... Adjourned till Friday, March 2.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

Regular Proceedings.

Friday, Feb. 23.—Senate.—The Senate devoted the entire day to the consideration of the Naval Appropriation bill, which was finally passed.

House.—The entire session was consumed, in committee of the whole, upon the Sundry Civil Appropriation bill.

Saturday, Feb. 24.—Senate.—The President pro tem. presented a communication from the President of the Electoral Commission, conveying the decision of the commission regarding the electoral votes from Oregon, and the House was notified that the Senate was ready to resume the counting of the votes of the States. Shortly afterward the Senators marched to the Hall of the House.... Upon the return of the Senate, Mr. Sargent submitted a resolution that the decision of the commission upon the electoral vote of Oregon stand as the judgment of the Senate. The resolution was adopted, and the Senate again proceeded to the Hall of the House to continue the count.

House.—The Army Appropriation bill was reported from the Appropriation Committee and ordered printed. It reduces the number of cavalry regiments to eight; artillery to four, and infantry to sixteen, and contains a proviso prohibiting any of the money appropriated by the bill from being applied for the pay, transportation or subsistence of troops to be employed in support of the claims of either Nicholls or Packard as Governor of Louisiana, or in support of the rival Legislatures in said State, and prohibits the employment of any portion of the army in support of the claims of any State Government or any officers of any State until duly recognized by Congress.... The Senate amendments to the Postoffice Appropriation bill were non-concurred in, and a conference committee ordered.... The House received the Senate at noon for the purpose of proceeding with the electoral count.... After the withdrawal of the Senate, a motion to adjourn was voted down. After considerable filibustering and much confusion, the House was brought to business by the presentation of the following, by Mr. Hale: "Ordered, That the count of the electoral vote of the State of Oregon shall proceed in conformity with the decision of the Electoral Commission." Mr. Lane offered the following as a substitute: "Ordered, That the vote purporting to be the electoral vote for President and Vice President, and which was given by one John W. Watts, claiming to be an elector from the State of Oregon, be not counted." In the discussion, which did not differ in substance from that which took place in the cases of Florida and Louisiana, Messrs. Lawrence, Phillips, LeMoyne, Stevenson, Neal, Woodworth, Sampson, Caldwell, Brown, Clymer, and Burchard (Ill.) made addresses. Mr. Hewitt arraigned Mr. Hoar for bad faith in deciding in the commission contrary to his expressed views in the House and in the committee by which the Electoral bill was framed. Mr. Hoar, replying, described Hewitt as a man rickety, shaky, crazy, and out of joint. The House finally voted to disagree with the decision of the Electoral Commission in the case of Oregon, and the Senate was notified.

Joint Convention.—The two houses met in joint convention at noon, and the decision of the Electoral Tribunal touching the votes from Oregon was read. In response to an inquiry from the presiding officer whether there were any objections to the decision, Senator Kelly presented objections on behalf of the Democrats, based upon the following grounds: First, that Watts was not elected; second, that he was not appointed; third, that he was disqualified to receive any appointment as a Presidential elector, or to sit as such, as he held an office of trust and profit under the United States; fourth, that Cronin was elected a Presidential elector for Oregon, and in accordance with law cast the legal vote as such elector for Tilden, and that such vote should be counted. The Senate thereupon withdrew to its chamber. Subsequently the two houses again met in joint session, the vote of Oregon was counted for Hayes, and the electoral certificates of Pennsylvania were read. Objections being called for, objection was offered to the vote of Elector Morrill, and the Senate retired without discussing the question.

Monday, Feb. 26.—Senate.—A communication from Justice Clifford was read, announcing that Senator Thurman, on account of illness, had resigned as a member of the Electoral Commission. On motion of Mr. McDonald, Mr. Kernan was unanimously chosen to fill the vacancy.... At 3:10 the Senate was officially notified of the action of the House in the Pennsylvania case, and the two houses thereupon met in joint session. Upon returning at 3:30, the President pro tem. announced that the Senate retired from the joint meeting upon objection made to the certificate of Rhode Island. The Secretary read the objection to the vote of William S. Slater, appointed elector by the Legislature in place of George H. Corliss. Mr. Burnside submitted a resolution that the vote of William S. Slater be counted with the other votes of the electors of Rhode Island, notwithstanding the objections made thereto. After a brief debate, the question being on the resolution of Mr. Burnside, it was unanimously agreed to—yeas, 57; nays, none. At 5:55 the Senate again met the House. Upon returning at 6:30, the President pro tempore announced that the Senate having retired from the joint meeting of the two houses upon an objection submitted to the certificate from South Carolina, and the papers having been submitted to the Electoral Commission, the Senate would now resume legislative business.... Conference committees were appointed on the Deficiency, Naval and Legislative Appropriation bills.

House.—After considerable filibustering the House decided, by a vote of 128 to 116, to listen to the reading of the testimony taken before the House Committee on Privileges in the case of Elector Boggs, of Pennsylvania, appointed instead of Daniel J. Morrill, Centennial Commissioner. Mr. Kelley then offered a resolution that the vote of Boggs should be counted, and Mr. Stenger offered a substitute that it should not be. A long and exciting debate ensued, in the course of which Mr. Hewitt again arraigned Mr. Hoar for bad faith, but appealed to the Democrats to yield to the decision, and trust to the ballot-box for the remedy. The members gathered around him in excited circles, and, as he closed with an invocation for peace, he was asked by Mr. Cate, of Wisconsin, why, if the decision was infamous, he advised yielding to it? Hewitt's reply was: "It is better to yield than to precipitate anarchy and revolution." Then the sentiment was characterized by Cate as cowardly. Mr. Yeates, of North Carolina, forced his way through the circle, and with a flushed face and excited manner exclaimed, addressing himself to Mr. Cate and the Democrats who were opposing acquiescence, "Those who denounce us now as cowards when the pinch came fifteen years ago turned against us." Mr. Stenger's substitute was adopted—yeas, 135; nays, 119. The two houses then met in joint session, but shortly after separated for the purpose of considering the objection to the counting of the vote of Elector Slater, of Rhode Island. A motion to adjourn for the day was voted down. The House then decided that the vote of Slater should be counted, and the two houses again met in joint convention. After separating, the House adjourned for the day.

Joint Convention.—The two houses met in joint session, and, the action of each house having been read, the presiding officer announced that, the two houses not having concurred otherwise, the votes of Pennsylvania would be counted. Senator Allison, one of the tellers, thereupon announced that the State of Pennsylvania had given twenty-nine votes for Hayes and Wheeler. The certificate from Rhode Island was then read, and objection was offered to the counting of the vote of Elector Slater, whereupon the two houses separated for the purpose of considering the objection. The joint session was resumed at 6 p. m., and the four votes of Rhode Island were announced as cast for Hayes and Wheeler. The next certificate opened was that from South Carolina, authenticated by Gov. Chamberlain, showing seven votes for Hayes and Wheeler. It was followed by another certificate showing seven votes for Tilden and Hendricks, with a statement by the electors explaining the absence of the Governor's authentication. Objection was offered to the Republican certificate on the ground that there was no legal election in South Carolina for Presidential electors; (2) that there did not exist, at the time of the election, a republican form of government in that State; (3) that the full exercise of the right of suffrage was prevented by military interference; (4) that United States Marshals were stationed at the polls, thereby interfering with the exercise of the right of suffrage. Objections were presented to the Democratic certificate (1) because the electors were not duly appointed; (2) because the votes are not certified by the Governor of the State; (3) because the papers have not annexed to them the names of the electors, as required by the laws of South Carolina; (4) because the Hayes electors were duly chosen in accordance with the laws of South Carolina and certified by the Governor. The objections having been read, they were submitted to the Electoral Commission for its judgment and decision, and the Senate retired to its own chamber.

Tuesday, Feb. 27.—Senate.—The Senate, by a vote of 29 to 26, postponed the further consideration of the Pacific Railroad Funding bill until the next session of Congress.... Mr. McDonald called up the House resolutions in respect to the memory of the late Speaker Kerr, and eulogies were delivered by Messrs. McDonald, Wallace, Wright, Bayard, Booth and Morton, after which the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.... The bill for the relief of settlers on public lands was passed. It authorizes homestead and pre-emption settlers whose crops were destroyed by grasshoppers in 1876 to leave and be absent from their lands until 1878.... House bill to provide for the sale of desert lands in the States of California, Oregon and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Wyoming, Arizona, New Mexico and Dakota was passed.

House.—Mr. Field, from the Committee on Privileges, reported the bill providing that, in case of a failure to elect a President and Vice President, the President of the Senate, or, in case of a vacancy in that office, then the Speaker of the House, or in case of a failure to elect a Speaker, then the Secretary of State, shall assume the office of President until the President has been elected. The bill was immediately ordered to its second reading, debate ordered to a third reading and passed.... Mr. Schleicher moved to suspend the rules, and adopt a resolution recognizing the Hampton and Nicholls Governments as the lawful Governments of the States of South Carolina and Louisiana. Rejected—156 to 93—not two-thirds in the affirmative.... The remainder of the day was devoted to the consideration of the Sundry Civil Appropriation bill.

Wednesday, Feb. 28.—Senate.—A communication was read from Justice Clifford, conveying the decision of the Electoral Commission in the case of South Carolina. Immediately the House was informed that the Senate was ready to continue the count of the electoral vote, and at 12:10 the Senate marched to the Hall of the House. The Senate returned at 12:35, and Mr. Robertson submitted a resolution that the decision of the commission upon the electoral vote of South Carolina stand as the judgment of the Senate, the objections made thereto to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. Bogy moved that the testimony in the South Carolina case be read. Rejected—yeas, 21; nays, 41. The two hours' discussion then commenced, and was participated in by Messrs. McCreery, McDonald, Morton, Bayard, Patterson, Logan, Saulsbury, Eaton, Sherman, Wadleigh, Merrimon, Blaine, Cameron (Wis.), Christiancy, and Kernan. The debate having closed, the resolution of Mr. Robertson that the decision of the commission upon the electoral vote of South Carolina stand as the judgment of the Senate, etc., was agreed to—yeas, 39; nays, 22—a strict party vote. The Senate then met the House for the purpose of continuing the count. Before returning to its chamber, at 7:15, the objections to the certificate from Vermont were read, and a resolution was unanimously adopted that the vote of Mr. Sollace as elector for Vermont be counted with the other electoral votes of the State, the objections thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

House.—The Speaker laid before the House a communication from Justice Clifford, informing the House that the Electoral Commission had decided the matter touching the electoral vote of South Carolina, and had transmitted the decision to the President of the Senate. The two houses thereupon met in joint session.... After the Senate had withdrawn from the Hall of the House, Mr. Springer made a motion to adjourn for the day. This was defeated—yeas, 92; nays, 170. A demand was then made for the reading of the testimony taken in the South Carolina case, a large, printed volume of some 1,200 pages. This was also defeated—yeas, 87; nays, 177. After some further attempts at delay, Mr. Cochrane offered a resolution that the decision of the Electoral Commission on the votes of South Carolina be not sustained by the House, and that the votes be not counted. A long and heated debate followed, at the conclusion of which the resolution was adopted, and the two houses met in joint convention.

Joint Convention.—At 12:10 p. m. the two houses met in joint convention, and the decision of the Electoral Commission in the case of South Carolina was read. Two sets of objections to the counting of the vote were presented—one by Mr. Phillips, of Missouri, and the other by Mr. Southard, of Ohio. The objections were based upon the same grounds taken by the objectors before the commission. After they had been read the Senate withdrew, that the two houses might act separately, and decide upon them.... The two houses came together again, at 6:20 p. m., and, the action of each body on the South Carolina decision having been read, the presiding officer announced that, the two houses not concurring otherwise, the electoral votes of South Carolina would be counted, and they were thereupon declared as 7 for Hayes and Wheeler. The votes of Tennessee (12) and Texas (8) were then announced and counted for Tilden and Hendricks without objection. Then came Vermont, with four votes for Hayes and Wheeler. Mr. Poppleton asked the presiding officer whether any other certificate from Vermont had been received by him, and he replied in the negative. Mr. Hewitt stated that he held in his hand a package purporting to contain the electoral votes of Vermont, which package had been delivered to him by express about the middle of December, and that with it came a letter stating that a similar package had been forwarded to the President of the Senate by mail. On learning to-day that no corresponding package had been received by the presiding officer, he had tendered to him this package (holding it up), the seals of which were still unbroken, and the presiding officer declined to receive it. He now tendered the package to the presiding officer as purporting to contain the electoral votes of Vermont. The Presiding Officer—"The Chair has stated that he has received but one certificate from Vermont. The Chair also states that the law prohibits him from receiving any certificates after the first Thursday in February. His duty is to receive, open, and have read all that have been received on that day." The presiding officer then asked if there were any objections to the vote of Vermont, whereupon the following, signed by Senator Merrimon and Representatives Springer and Hamilton, of Indiana, was presented: "The undersigned Senators and members object to the counting of the votes of the State of Vermont for the reason that two returns or papers purporting to be the returns of the electoral vote of said State were forwarded to the President of the Senate, and that only one of said returns has been laid before the two houses. The President of the Senate having stated that but one return has been received by him from said State, a duplicate copy of one of the said returns is herewith submitted for the consideration of the Senate and House of Representatives." Mr. Poppleton then presented two sets of objections to the vote of Henry N. Sollace, one of the electors, on the ground that he was Postmaster when elected, and that the law of Vermont did not authorize an appointment by the College of electors to fill the vacancy caused by the absence of an elector. Mr. Springer demanded the reading of the duplicate return sent up with his objection, but the presiding officer persisted in his refusal to have it read.... The two houses then adjourned.

Thursday, March 1.—Senate.—Nothing was done in the Senate beyond voting to count the electoral votes of Wisconsin for Hayes.

House.—The day's proceedings in the House were of an exciting, and at times disorderly, character. Those in favor of preventing a conclusion of the electoral count, led by Mr. Springer and Mr. Walling, resorted to all sorts of filibustering tactics, and the morning hour passed before anything was done. Mr. Caulfield succeeded in getting a resolution read reciting, in the form of a preamble, that a sealed package was addressed to the President of the Senate by Mr. Hewitt; that it appears by a telegram from the Clerk of the United States District Court of Vermont that a duplicate of such return was deposited in that office on the 13th of December, 1876; that such package had been made part of the objection to the certificate of Vermont, and still remained unopened, and that the objection cannot be considered until such package is opened according to law; that such package is retained by the President or Secretary of the Senate, and therefore resolving that the refusal of the President of the Senate to open such package in presence of the two houses was a violation of law and of the privileges of the House, and, until such package shall be opened, the counting of the vote cannot proceed further, according to the constitution and law, and that the Senate be requested to meet the House in joint session so that such package may be opened and proceeding had thereon according to law. Speaker Randall ruled the resolution out of order. A scene of excitement and confusion then ensued, nearly half the members being on their feet at once. A good deal of colloquy ensued as to what had become of the paper, and, while the discussion was in progress, a messenger from the Senate entered the hall and tendered the package to Mr. Hewitt, who refused to receive it. Mr. Garfield read a letter from the Secretary of the Senate, saying that he had put the package purporting to be the second certificate in his pocket, as the package looked like a private communication, but, being admonished that his reception of it might be construed as a reception of it by President Ferry, he took it from his pocket and placed it on his desk, and since that time he had not seen the package. Mr. Stone, who was one of the tellers, stated that he saw the Secretary of the Senate throw the package under the desk and among the rubbish; that he (Stone) immediately wrote a note to Mr. Hewitt, and that Mr. Hewitt and he had a conversation, during which he saw the Secretary take the package from under the desk and put it in his pocket. Mr. Field offered an amendment to Mr. Caulfield's resolution, to the effect that the second certificate from Vermont be opened in the presence of the two houses of Congress and sent to the Electoral Commission. A vote was then taken amid the most intense excitement, and it was defeated—yeas, 116; nays, 142. A number of dilatory motions were made, and it was not until 9:30 p. m. that a vote was taken on the resolution that the vote of Elector Sollace be not counted. It was carried—yeas, 205; nays, 26—most of the Republicans voting with the majority, for the purpose of sooner bringing the question to a close. The two houses then assembled in joint session. As soon as the Senate had withdrawn, Mr. Mills, of Texas, offered a resolution to the effect that, as there had been a failure to elect a President of the United States, "the House will proceed immediately in obedience to the constitution to choose a President from the persons having the highest number of votes, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President." Mr. Wood, of New York, moved an adjournment, but there were objections, and a scene of uproar and confusion ensued, lasting for several minutes, in the course of which Blackburn exclaimed that Friday, hangman's day, had been ushered in—a fit day to witness the consummation of the villainy and scandal of this proceeding. At 3:40 a. m. the debate closed, and the House decided, by a rising vote, not to count the vote of Downs. Mr. Mills then withdrew his resolution to go into an election for President. The joint session was then resumed.

Joint Convention.—The two houses met in joint session at 11 p. m. The action of each house on the objections having been read, the presiding officer announced that (the two houses not concurring otherwise) the electoral votes of Vermont would be counted, and they were therefore declared as 5 for Hayes and Wheeler. Then the certificate of Virginia was read, and the vote of that State was announced as 11 for Tilden and Hendricks. The vote of West Virginia was next announced as 5 for Tilden and Hendricks. Then came the last State, the State of Wisconsin, with 10 votes for Hayes and Wheeler. The certificates of Wisconsin having been read, Mr. Lynde presented objections to the counting of the vote of Elector Downs, on the ground that he held the office of Examining Surgeon of the Pension Office at the time he acted as elector, and was therefore not qualified. The two houses then separated to consider and determine the objections. At 4:04 a. m. the joint convention was resumed. The decisions of the Senate and House in the case of Wisconsin were read, and Mr. Ferry directed the tellers to count Wisconsin. He then announced that the counting of the electoral votes of the thirty-eight States of the Union was completed, and directed the tellers to ascertain the result. Mr. Allison, one of the tellers, announced: "R. B. Hayes, 185; Samuel J. Tilden, 184." Mr. Ferry then announced that Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler had been declared elected President and Vice President of the United States, and the joint convention dissolved.

A Mule Story.

At the Jacksonville (Ill.) Asylum for Feeble-Minded Children one of the young lady teachers sought deeply to interest her class by telling the story of Absalom. Dwelling, with all a woman's tact and persuasive eloquence, upon the dreadful end of a wayward, willful life, and giving special emphasis to the most important moral lessons suggested by the fact that the young man Absalom, resisting all the better influences which surrounded him, rebelled against a kind father, she had in simple, earnest language wrought up the story with chief reference to its moral impressions upon those half-demented children. Curious to know what had been the degree of her success, she requested them to ask questions about anything in the story that most interested them. Not over-flattering to her was the result when one of the little fellows, looking up with the utmost simplicity, eagerly asked: "Did they git the mule?"

Death of the Big-Headed Boy.

Matthew Dorn, the monster-headed boy, is dead. He was 15 years of age, and was certainly a curiosity, if not a monstrosity, so far as his cranium was concerned. It is said that his head was nearly four feet in circumference, and weighed quite eighty pounds. He was of Irish parentage. When six weeks old his head began growing much more rapidly than his body, and continued to grow up to within a few weeks of his death, which occurred recently. He was never able to sit up, but could move his head from right to left while lying on a pillow. During the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia, he was taken there by speculative persons, but the undertaking did not prove successful there or in Albany, where he was subsequently exhibited for a few days. His body at the time of his death weighed about one-half as much as his head.—Troy (N. Y.) Times.

Selling Tramps.

A Hartford paper tells how a lady of that city "plays it" on tramps, through the agency of the bogus money known as "advertising greenbacks," and which to the casual observer appear genuine. The lady with studied carelessness puts a bill of this kind under the mat at the back door, and waits the approach of the innocents. Up to the door comes trampy, and his greedy eyes at once alight on the money. In a dash it is transferred to his pocket, and without stopping to knock and beg, as he intended to do, he hurries out of sight, radiant with the joy of one who unexpectedly strikes good luck. When at a safe distance he looks at the bill, and as the extent of the terrible deception dawns upon him he clutches his hair and with a wild, despairing cry of "Sold, by Jerusalem!" crawls into a convenient rat-hole and dies.

PROCURE seeds early from the seed stores. The assortments are always the best early.

DO NOT buy fruit trees from the extravagantly colored pictures shown by traveling agents.

THE wingless female of the canker worm begins to crawl up the trees as soon as the ground thaws.

PRUNING must be done before or wait till after the sap flows. Use wax or paint to cover large wounds.

A YOUNG farmer friend asks us what he will do to make money. Buy a sow and pigs and take care of them.

IF young lambs are coming along about those times those having care of them must recollect Mark xiii, 37.

COWS should be dried off from four to six weeks before calving. Give them generous food of moist hay, but little grain.

HORSES that have been kept on hay and corn fodder can now be grained more thoroughly preparatory for the spring work.

IF you are going to set fruit trees in the spring, it is time orders were made and sent to some reliable nurseryman, as near home as possible.

SEE that plows, harrows, corn-markers, corn-planters, seeders, singletrees, harness, and everything needed in putting in crops, are in perfect repair.

MANURE, rich and well rotted, is the one thing needful for gardens, East, West, North or South. Have it ready in time before all hands drive afield.

LET the boys, when home from school on Saturdays, build neat houses for martins, blue-birds and wrens, and put them up about houses, barns and fruit yards.

HOT beds can be made early next month for tomatoes, cabbages, peppers, egg-plants, etc. They are simple and easy of construction, and any one can have them.

ALLOW young calves to have the milk of the cow for four or five days. The first milk is medicinal, and it is necessary the young animals should have it to make them healthy.

INSECTS are to be fought at any time. Remove the eggs of the tent caterpiller before they hatch. They will be found near the end of the twigs, wound around like a neat band.

FRUIT trees can be profitably washed with strong soap-suds or lye. It can be done any time now until the busy season commences. It kills dormant insects, removes mosses and linchens, and improves the trees generally.

THE peddlers of apple trees grafted on Canada stock are humbuggers of the worst kind. But the people need not be humbugged unless they want to be. It is a free country, and none of their natural rights should be taken.

BREEDING sows should have potatoes or succulent food before farrowing. Put poles around the pen eight inches from the floor and the same distance from the sides, to keep the sows from over-laying their pigs. Give them clean, well-littered beds, but not enough to endanger the young.

WHY in the olden times did men live to such immense ages? It was not permitted that meat should be eaten until after the flood. So, if you want to live long in the land it is time to begin preparations for the early garden, for there is where many of God's blessings come from.

IF fruit trees have been gnawed by mice and rabbits during the deep snows, if it does not amount to entire riddling, smooth off the torn and rough edges and paint thoroughly with grafting wax, or make a plaster of dry and fresh cow dung and cover thickly, and bind on with a cloth.

APPLES FOR COWS.—Those who have fed apples freely to their cows and other stock this fall have found them very useful in increasing the quantity of milk, and many think they have improved the quality also. At the meeting of the board at Worcester there was a general expression of opinion in favor of the practice and its economy. Many thought the apples were worth 12½ cents a bushel for this purpose, and no one put them less than 10 cents, and from that to 15. We think they are worth at least 10 cents a bushel to feed out, and that is far better than to let them rot on the ground. But they ought to be fed out when mature, when they are ripe enough to eat, when their sugar is elaborated. It does not follow that they should be mellow enough to suit us, but they should at least be ripe.

About the House.

CUP CAKE.—Four eggs, two cups of sugar, one of butter, one-half cup of sweet milk, three of flour, one and a half teaspoonfuls of yeast powder.

FISH SAUCE.—Boil two onions and three anchovies in a pint and a half of water till quite soft; then thicken with flour and butter and add two glasses of wine, claret or port.

MUSH.—Stir corn meal, mixed to a paste with cold water and salted, into a pot of boiling water; add more meal if not thick enough; boil an hour, stirring frequently to prevent lumpiness; serve hot and eat with cold milk.

TO TAKE WRINKLES OUT OF SILK.—If silk scarfs or handkerchiefs have become wrinkled, moisten, not wet them, evenly with a sponge dipped in a weak solution of glue; then pin the article, smoothly and tightly stretched, upon a screen or a mattress.

CORN-STARCH CAKE.—Two cups of powdered sugar, one cup of butter, the whites of six eggs, three-fourths of a cup of sweet milk, three-fourths of a cup of corn-starch, two cups of flour, three teaspoonfuls of baking powder mixed in the flour, flavor to suit the taste.

RICE AND APPLES.—The following is a very nice thing, especially for children: Core as many nice apples as will fill the dish; boil them in light molasses; prepare a quarter of a pound of rice in milk, with sugar and salt; put some of the rice into the dish, then put in the apples and fill up the intervals with rice, and bake it in the oven until it is a fine color.

GERMAN POTATO CHEESE.—Roll sound white potatoes, peel and mash them perfectly smooth; to five pounds of the mashed potatoes, when cold, add a little more than a pint of sour milk; season it with salt and knead it well; cover it and let it remain, according to the season, from two to four days; then knead it afresh and make it into small cheeses; hang them up in a basket in the shade to dry; when they are sufficiently dry put them up in layers in large pots or kegs, and keep them closely covered. It will be fit for use in three or four weeks, but become finer the longer it is kept. It must be kept in a dry place well-covered.—Germantown Telegraph.

The Blue-Glass Theory.

The blue-glass notion is naturally one of the most delightful objects of the daily satirist; we are pleased to see the lively pen of the paragrapher busy in its illustration. At the same time it is very useful for the paragrapher himself to know something, and not dub poor Gen. Pleasonton's catholicon "a melancholy burlesque of science," until he is quite sure he is right. The fundamental idea that light coming through blue glass has a peculiar stimulative effect is not a fancy. The use of blue glass in graperies or peacheries did not begin with Pleasonton; nor was he the first to experiment with it on animal life; for there are not a few poultry raisers who have proved the virtue of blue-tinted glass in the superior warmth of the fowls' houses, and the subsequent, if not consequent, increase in the production of eggs. Scientific authority has long ago demonstrated the great increase in the production of heat by the use of blue-stained glass. The philosophy is precisely what is urged in favor of this new notion of Pleasonton's; that the light striking with a velocity of 186,000 miles an hour—a force not the less real because we are unconscious of it—is decomposed in its impact with the blue glass, and electricity generated, the results being augmentation of caloric, and vital stimulation. In this connection we have a note from an electrician, suggesting that the effect of the blue ray may be the production of the as yet uncomprehended element known as ozone. Of course, there is nothing absolutely fixed by the experimentation with blue glass excepting this. The alleged cures of nervous disease, bruises, debility, etc., by its means, may many of them be merely instances of the power of imagination on sensitive temperaments. They are rather more credible, however, than the miracles of the Lourdes grotto, or those recorded in Dr. W. W. Patton's book of answer to prayer, or the story of Dorothea Trudel. They at least have a basis of fact, and the trial of the blue-glass cure is both harmless and comparatively inexpensive.—Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

Crime in the East Indies.

A correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, writing from Madras, says: "The great jail delivery which took place in India on New Year's day gives one a strange notion of the vastness of our Eastern empire. On that day 10 per cent. of the criminal population were turned loose upon the land, to the number of 15,988. It is true that a few of these were political offenders, and that a considerable proportion were prisoners who had been sentenced to one month's imprisonment, and had worked out one-half of their term. Others were imprisoned debtors who had been thrown into jail for sums not exceeding 100 rupees, and whose debts were then discharged. But after making these allowances, we shall not be far wrong in estimating the actual criminal population of the Indian jails on the last day of 1876 at fully 140,000 persons. This is the force of the standing army of Indian crime that has to be maintained at no trifling cost to the State, and with only a negative advantage. While in prison they are powerless to do evil, but the frequency of recommittals proves the inefficacy of the systems of penal discipline enforced in the majority of Indian prisons."

Curious Ways of the Buffalo.

The ways of the buffalo, as described by travelers in the far West, are as strange as those of the Heathen Chinee. If a herd of these animals gets on the north side of the track, it will stand stupidly gazing, though the locomotive passes within 100 yards of it. But, if two miles from the track on the south side, the whole herd is thrown into the wildest commotion. Regardless of consequences, it will make for the track, and, if the train is in its way, each individual buffalo will go at it with the desperation of despair, plunging against or between the locomotive and the car. There was a notable instance of this in the severe winter of 1871–72, when the ponds and small rivers were frozen solid, and the buffalo was forced to the larger rivers for water. The conductors of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe railroad, after having trains ditched twice in one week, learned to have a very decided respect for the idiosyncrasies of the buffalo, and when there was a possibility of striking a herd on the rampage for the north side of the track, stopped the train until it passed.

The Tichborne Claimant.

Dr. Kenealy recently wrote to the Earl of Derby calling his attention to the alleged new evidence in the Tichborne case, and asking whether in the event of his going to Spain to inquire into the matter his Lordship would "give him any facilities for the elucidation of the truth." His Lordship responded ambiguously. Meanwhile, Mr. Cobbett has made another effort to obtain the claimant's release. The Court of Appeals, however, amid much laughter, refused to entertain the application. Mr. Cobbett claims that "Sir Roger" was illegally convicted under an act which had been repealed five years previous to his trial, and that, even if the conviction was good, his sentence could not legally exceed seven years, instead of fourteen years.

THE Detroit Board of Trade has officially expressed its approval of the proposal to appropriate $50,000 to give the Howgate plan of polar explorations a practical test.

TOOTHSOME DISHES FOR INVALIDS

With Hints for Their Preparation.

When forced to lie upon beds of pain, a tempting dish is often more agreeable to us than anything else but the cheering visit of the doctor, or the sweet sympathy of friends and their kindly offerings of flowers. And, indeed, it is often more desirable than even these pleasing attentions, for life frequently depends entirely upon the nutrition of the body. Yet one will turn with loathing from a cup of badly prepared beef tea, and the leathery toast and the thick, disgusting bowl of porridge, which so often compose the bill of fare of the sick-room, are not attractive to the palate. A school for teaching nurses how to cook would seem to be quite as desirable as the lectures given to them at Bellevue Hospital, for hardly one in ten can ever give a patient a cup of tea redolent with its true aroma. "Not a cup of tea!" you exclaim! "No;" we repeat it, "not even a cup of tea." Just try this method of making tea, and taste it with dainty sips, and see for yourself how different is its flavor from that drawn in the common way:

HOW TO MAKE A DELICIOUS CUP OF TEA.

Scald out the teapot, turning out all the water, and put in as many heaping teaspoonfuls as you desire to make cupfuls. Place the teapot upon the stove, and count fifty seconds. Then pour in a teacupful of boiling water to every two teaspoonfuls of tea, and if it is Oolong or Hyson tea do not let it boil at all, but place it upon the back part of the stove or upon the elevated boiler for five minutes to become well infused in the water, and then weaken it to the taste. If the patient likes milk or cream in it, a large proportion of that will make the draught more nutritious than if weakened with water. But if the tea is English breakfast or black tea (either of which is far more wholesome than the other kinds), it should be steeped from eight to ten minutes, according to its strength, and then prepared by turning into the cup the cream and then the tea. By slightly roasting the leaves of tea in the pot before the water is added to them, a very pleasant flavor is produced.

HOW TO PREPARE EGG TOAST.

And, while the tea is being drawn, a thinly-cut slice of toast can be well browned but not burned—and an egg or two can be dropped into boiling water in which one teaspoonful of vinegar has been poured, and a little salt added to it. Pour one table-spoonful of boiling water over a bit of butter as large as a walnut, turn it over the toast, and if it is very dry dip the whole of it into the melted butter and water, soaking the crusts completely. Skim out the eggs as soon as the whites are firmly set, and put them upon the toast. Edge the plate with a few sprigs of fresh, green parsley, or some sweet geranium leaves, and serve upon a salver covered with a white napkin, and an invalid will usually eat of it with great relish.

HOW TO PREPARE BARLEY OR GROATS FOR GRUEL.

Take a table-spoonful of groats, and mix it smoothly with a little cold water. Turn over it one pint of boiling water, stirring it slowly until it is a smooth mass. Boil it for twenty or thirty minutes, stirring it often. Season with a little salt and sugar and nutmeg, if the last two condiments are agreeable to the patient. But the flavor of rum or whisky is usually the most liked by all.

BARLEY WATER.

For feverish patients barley water is excellent, as it gives nourishment while it quenches thirst. Wash two ounces of pearl barley, turn over it a pint of boiling water, and let it stand ten minutes. Turn this off, and add two quarts of boiling water, and boil slowly until it has evaporated one-half. Strain off the liquid and flavor it with the juice of one lemon, and one or two slices of the rind. Add a very little sugar. Stir it up with a spoon whenever the patient desires a glass of it, as it is watery on the top and milky at the bottom of the pitcher.

TRIPE ON TOAST.

Tripe is now considered as good food for invalids as can be prepared, and if it is well cooked it is decidedly appetizing, but it must be served smoking-hot on a very thin slice of toasted bread. Select a tender piece of the honey-comb, and rub a bit of butter over the heated bars of the gridiron, then brown the tripe on both sides, dipping it into a little butter and water to baste it well as it cooks. Have a hot plate close at hand, and as soon as it is cooked well cut it up into the finest strips. Season with pepper and salt, and serve on the toast. Keep it covered tightly with a hot plate while carrying it to the sick-room.

CHICKEN TEA.

There is not nearly as much nourishment in chicken tea as in that prepared from beef, yet it is more relished by patients with a delicate appetite. The whole fowl need not be boiled, as it is the jelly that is required, rather than the meat, and the white parts are most deficient in that matter. So cut out the breast, and save it for a grill or broiled dish on toast. Take the skin off, and tear away all fatty portions, then boil the remainder very slowly for three hours—not letting it "gallop" at all—and season with salt and a little pepper. For this purpose an old fowl is better than a tender chicken, as it possesses more gelatinous matter. Chicken jelly can be prepared in the same way by adding half as much sherry as chicken tea. If it does not jelly in twenty-four hours, boil it down again.

A Truly Wonderful Country.

The American Engineer thus lumps the wonders of our country: "The greatest cataract in the world is the falls of Niagara, where the water from the great upper lakes forms a river of three-fourths of a mile in width, and then, being suddenly contracted, plunges over the rocks in two columns to the depth of 175 feet. The greatest cave in the world is the mammoth cave of Kentucky, where any one can make a voyage on the waters of a subterranean river, and catch fish without eyes. The greatest river in the known world is the Mississippi, 400 miles long. The largest valley in the world is the valley of the Mississippi. It contains 500,000 square miles, and is one of the most fertile regions on the globe. The greatest city park in the world is in Philadelphia. It contains over 2,700 acres. The greatest grain port in the world is Chicago. The largest lake in the world is Lake Superior, which is truly an inland sea, being 430 miles long and 1,000 feet deep. The longest railroad at present is the Pacific railroad, over 3,000 miles in length. The greatest mass of solid iron in the world is the Iron Mountain, of Missouri. It is 350 feet high and two miles in circuit. The best specimen of Grecian architecture in the world is the Girard College for Orphans, Philadelphia. The largest aqueduct in the world is the Croton aqueduct, New York. Its length is forty and one-half miles, and its cost $12,500,000. The largest deposits of anthracite coal in the world are in Pennsylvania, the mines of which supply the market with millions of tons annually, and appear to be inexhaustible.

A Decision by Instinct.

[From the New York Herald.]

"This is, indeed, a difficult task to decide," said Judge Duffy at the Tombs Police Court, yesterday, twirling his mustache reflectively, and gazing at a huge Newfoundland dog which pantingly struggled to free itself from the chain held by the court policeman. "You, John Koler," he added, "claim the dog as your property, and you, Paul Kanitz, say the animal is yours. Now, it stands to reason that one of you is making a false statement, and, under the circumstances, I am at a loss what disposition to make of the animal."

"Give 'um to me," cried an irreverent Baxter street youth of 8 years, dodging under the arm of an officer to avoid a well-directed cuff. The Judge looked up scowlingly, and the slight titter occasioned by the urchin's temerity instantly subsided. The subject of dispute ceased his struggling as if in sympathy with the gravity of the court, and, giving a final wag to his tail, sat down quietly to await the judicial decision.

"It is clear to my mind," resumed Judge Duffy, fingering a law book and fixing his eyes on the dog, "that Kanitz is the prima-facie owner, because the animal was in his possession at the time of arrest; yet if Koler's statement is correct the apparent owner is in reality but a trustee, and the dog the property in trust."

At this the animal again grew restless, but an admonitory twitch of the chain by the officer caused him to renew his attention to the exposition of the law.

"In the absence of evidence further than that already adduced," Judge Duffy continued, "I can decide this case only on the intelligence of the property itself, and, as the animal is capable only of indicating its former proprietor by instinct, by instinct shall I decide the case." The words were evidently well weighed, and the Judge closed the law book indicative of his determination.

"The claimants will take up positions at the further wings of the court-room, opposite each other," ordered the Judge. The rival owners, looking mystified, placed themselves in the positions required and scowled at each other.

"Now," said the Judge, "when I give the signal each of you will whistle simultaneously and the officer will release the dog, and the animal, thus free to choose for himself, will, as a matter of course, go direct to his lawful owner."

"Officer, are you ready?"

"Yes, your Honor."

The audience rose to witness the denouement, and the simple drunk by a stupendous effort checked his hiccoughing. The Court looked around to see that there was no foul play and then took up a cross-legged position on the magisterial chair, the better to see the result. Every eye was riveted on the animal.

All being in readiness, the Judge shouted:

"One, two, three—time."

Koler set up a whistle, long and loud, that sounded like a locomotive trying to emulate the Centennial fog-horn. It filled the court-room, tingling the ears of the Judge. Kanitz puffed, panted and whistled short and shrill by jerks. Never was such music heard in temple of justice before. The standing audience strained forward with intense interest, and even the Court arose spasmodically from its cross-legged position and leaned half over the bench.

The dog, released from his chain, lifted his head and stepped briskly in front of the railing. He looked first at Koler, then at Kanitz, wagged his tail at the Judge and darted through the open front door, down the stone steps, and up Center street with the speed of the wind.

Suicide Statistics.

A curious and suggestive table of statistics has recently appeared in France, which will doubtless prove of much value in the hands of students of psychology and nervous mental ailments. It relates to suicides; and the conditions, etc., of the people who made away with themselves in 1874 in France are taken as the basis of the figures. In that year, 5,617 suicides occurred, the largest number ever known in any one year in the country. Of these, 4,435, or 79 per cent., were committed by men, 1,182, or 21 per cent., by women. In spite of the careful investigations of the police, the ages of 105 people could not be determined. The 5,512 others are divided as follows: 16 years, 29; between 16 and 21 years, 193; between 21 and 40 years, 1,477; between 40 and 60 years, 2,214; exceeding the last-mentioned age, 1,599. About 36 per cent. of these unfortunates were unmarried; 48 per cent. married, and 16 per cent. widowers. Of those which constituted the last two classes, nearly two-thirds had children. More than seven-tenths of the suicides were effected by strangulation or drowning. The crime was most frequently committed during spring, when 31 per cent. of the whole number destroyed themselves; during other seasons the percentages were: in summer, 27; in winter, 23; in autumn, 19.

Included in the tables are the results of the judicial inquests, showing the professions and calling of the deceased. About 33 per cent. were farmers, 30 per cent. mechanics, 4 per cent. merchants or business men, 16 per cent. members of the liberal professions, 4 per cent. servants, and 13 per cent. were destitute of any calling. The table even analyzes, in all but 481 people, the motives which caused the fatal act. Thus we are told that 652 killed themselves because of reverses in fortune, 701 through family troubles, 572 through drunkenness, 243 through love, debauchery, etc.; 798 died to avoid physical suffering, 59 to avoid the penalties of capital crimes, 489 for unclassified troubles, and 1,622 were clearly shown to have been afflicted with some mental disease.

MARRIED IN THE DARK.

A Michigan Matrimonial Mystery—Four Claimants for a Bride.

[Jackson (Mich.) Cor. New York Herald.]

About twenty years ago there lived in Central Michigan a curious old Benedick named Dodsworth. At the age of 50 he married a girl of 20, and when the burden of 60 years bore him down his wife was only half his age. Dodsworth was noted for his peculiarities, but the climax came when he found himself on his dying bed. He was worth about $80,000, and he hadn't a blood relative living, so far as he knew. He wanted to leave his property to his wife, as the pair had lived very happily, but yet he could not leave it without displaying some of his peculiarities in the provisions of the will. Some old men display a mean spirit when making their wills, and draft in a provision cutting the wife off with a shilling if she marries again. This old man wasn't of that stamp. His young wife was good looking, vivacious, fond of society, and it was folly to suppose she would mourn for her "late departed" any great length of time. Therefore Mr. Dodsworth turned heel on the usual custom and said in his will:

In case my wife Celia does not take unto herself another husband within thirteen months from date of my burial, all bequests otherwise made in this will are to the State of Michigan, to be used for building and furnishing a home for old women.

Whether Celia was pleased or displeased at this provision deponent saith not, but the old man had not been under the sod more than six months when the widow was said to be looking out for another man. If it was singular for the dying Dodsworth to urge his wife to marry again, it was still more singular that he should desire the ceremony to be performed under the following circumstances, viz:

And it is made incumbent on said Celia Dodsworth that in taking a new husband the marriage ceremony shall be performed in the big barn on my farm on the H—— road. It shall take place at 10 o'clock in the evening, on the main floor, without lights of any description, with all doors shut, and a free invitation shall be extended to all. The clergyman shall stand in the stables and the bride and groom on the main floor, and the principal parties to the ceremony shall be dressed in black throughout.

The widow announced her intention to faithfully obey in spirit and letter, the will was probated, and the twelfth month had scarcely passed before she issued an invitation for the public to attend a wedding at the big barn. Just who the groom was to be no one could positively assert, as the widow had been keeping company with a widower, a bachelor and two young men, and, as far as any outsider could judge, she loved one as well as the other. Being good-looking and talented, and having a fortune behind her, it was not strange that she should have a number of suitors. She seemed to enter into the spirit of the affair with great zest, as also did the minister; and, to further mystify the people in attendance, the bride entered the barn alone at one door, the groom alone at another, and no one knew that the minister had arrived until his voice was heard in the stables.

There were at least 200 people present, and each one understood that even the striking of a match would break the will. Many jokes were passed, and considerable confusion existed, but at length the minister announced that all was ready. The ceremony was gone through with, and, at its conclusion, the affair having been a "profound success," a rush was made for the bride; she was kissed by 100 men, and was then carried home, a distance of a mile and a half, in a big arm-chair.

Now comes the mystery. When the lady was down at her own door the widower, the bachelor, and the two young men each claimed to be her true and lawful husband. None of the crowd could say who was the lucky man, the minister was at sea, and the bride herself seemed to have doubts. The widower was the man of her choice, but in the confusion he could have been hustled aside, and he did affirm that an attempt had been made to choke him and get him out of the barn. The bachelor vowed that she had promised to marry him, as also did both young men, and each one was sure that he held the widow's plump hand and was legally married to her. The four men had a fight, but that didn't mend matters. The crowd ducked two of them in a creek, but that didn't decide the question.

Just how it would have terminated had not the widower been a man of nerve, no one can tell, as the other three had already appealed to the law, when the widower stepped in and took his place as husband, and settled with the others for $2,000 each.

One of the young men, now over 40 years old, and having all the wife he wants (she weighs 230 pounds), is living in this city, and, during an interview had with him to-day, he solemnly and earnestly assured your correspondent that he was legally married to the Widow Dodsworth that night in the big barn. Another of the parties lives in Clinton county, and he has time and again asserted that he is the woman's true and lawful husband, so help him God. The bachelor is dead, but, were he alive and kicking he would renew his oft-repeated protestations—

"I married her, by gum! and, by gum, I ought to have her!"

Mixing Colors.

The following recipes will enable the amateur painter to mix many shades or tints that he may require: Cream color—This is a mixture of chrome yellow, the best Venetian red and white lead. Pearl gray—White lead, with equal portions of Prussian blue and lamp-black. The blue must be used very cautiously, as it is a powerful color. Fawn color—Burned sienna, ground fine and mixed with white lead. Buff—This is a mixture of pale chrome yellow and white lead tinged with a little Venetian red. Straw—A mixture of pale chrome yellow and white lead. Drab—Raw or burnt umber and white lead, with a little Venetian red.

Carrying Weight.

A series of experiments made in France shows approximately that the heaviest load a man of strength can carry for a short distance is 319 pounds. All a man can carry habitually, as, for example, a soldier his knapsack, walking on a level ground, is 132 pounds—an extreme load, it would seem—or he can carry an aggregate of 1,518 pounds over 8,200 feet as a day's work, under like circumstances. If he ascend ladders or stairs, as do hod-carriers, then he can carry but 121 pounds continuously, and his day's work cannot exceed 1,282 pounds raised 8,200 feet high.

HOUSE.—Bills were ordered engrossed as follows:

To prevent extortionate charges by railroads for carrying freight; prohibiting the granting of aid by counties, townships and cities to railroads.... Senate bills to prevent the obstruction of highways by freight trains; to change the name of the Evansville and Crawfordsville railroad; amending the act for the incorporation of the Wabash and Erie railroad, and making it unlawful to get on or off moving trains, were passed to a third reading.... The Belt Railroad bill was taken up, and, after a lengthy discussion, was passed, by 38 to 10.... The resolution making it the sense of the Senate and House that steps should be taken to build a new State House was indefinitely postponed.... Considerable excitement was created in the Senate, during the afternoon, by the sudden cracking of the ceiling in one corner of the chamber. The lobbies were crowded, and a stampede was made for the doors. Men tumbled over each other in their eagerness to get out. The panic lasted only a few minutes, and fortunately nobody was hurt.

HOUSE.—The House passed a few bills of minor importance, after which came the General Appropriation bill and the Revenue bill, which fixes the tax levy at 13 cents on the $100. The House went into committee of the whole and considered the bill by sections, and adopted section 1 and 9, and clauses of section 3. The Senate bill in relation to the accounts of the Congressional school funds was passed.

HOUSE.—The State House bill was brought up and defeated for want of a constitutional majority. The vote resulted—yeas, 47; nays, 45.... The most of the day was spent in the committee of the whole discussing the Appropriation and Revenue bills. The clause appropriating $25,000 for State House repairs was stricken out. The committee then arose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.... This afternoon an attempt was made to pass the State House bill, but it failed, the vote on it resulting, yeas, 45; nays, 44—not a constitutional majority.... The House held an evening session, for the purpose of considering the Revenue bill, which was finally passed.

FRUIT HOUSE PRICES.

No dull times with us---Our trade continually on he increase.

No secret about it, simply purchasing our goods in large quantities of first hands and selling direct to our customers at a small profit, thereby saving them the profits of the middle men which ands 15 to 20 per cent, even forty per cent on some goods. This saving we are bound to give to our customers.

Take tea for instance: The advance on that article from the time it arrives in New and is sold to the speculator, and from him to the jobber, and from the jobber to the wholesale grocer, and from the wholesale grocer to the retail dealer, is at least 30 per cent. As each of these dealers has to make his 5 to 10 per cent, on the sale, and then the retailer, he must have his profit and by the time it reaches the consumer there is at least 50 per cent added to it. We cut all these off by ordering direct from the importer and selling direct to the consumer. When we first commenced, our trade was two chests a month and now it is as many chests a day. So with all other goods Sugars, Coffees, Tobaccoes, Fish, Spice or anything we deal in, we purchase at the first hands and resell direct to the consumer and save the profits of the middle dealers.

Dated March 1st, 1877.

Scarcity of Money.

There is no doubt but the present condition of all kinds of business and industry is fearfully depressed, and it behooved every family to look carefully to their expenses. Spring is coming on when children are liable to Croup, Whooping Cough, etc. Coughs and Colds will prevail everywhere, and Consumption, with other throat and lung diseases, will carry off many. These diseases should not be neglected. Doctor's bills are expensive, and we would advise our people to use Boschee's German Syrup. It never has failed. One bottle at 75 cents will keep your whole family well during the winter. Two doses will relieve any case. Sold in all towns in the United States, and by your druggist F. E. Davenport.

Forcing a Proposal.

'Cordolia, how is this going to last?' asked a Philadelphia mother the other night immediately after her daughter's [illegible].

'What thing, ma?'

'Why, this courting business of yours.'

'Oh! ma.'

'Yes, I think you may as well say, Oh! ma, for hasn't there been fire in the parlor stove three nights this week already, and only half a ton of coal in the cellar? I declare it does run up expenses at a fearfull rate just now, when your father is out of work. Besides, there's the gas.'

'But, ma, we don't use but the least speck of gas,' pleaded Cordolia.

'Don't use but the least speck of gas!' echoed the mother. 'Let me catch you sitting in that room with only the least speck of gas. It isn't proper unless you are engaged, and I'll not allow it. When do you think he will pop the question?'

'Oh! ma.'

'Yes, I think it is owe me, and if you keep on at this rate your ma will owe everybody else. There is entirely too much nonsense among young people about their courting.'

'But ma, I don't know that he wants me to marry him.'

Well, why don't you find out? Is'nt this leap year? Where is your tongue.'

'But, ma, I can't ask him. It is'nt proper.'

'Is'nt proper, indeed! Well, then, I'll ask him myself the next night he comes here. This courting a girl for five or six years is'nt proper, either, and I'm not agoing to let you throw away all your chances in life on a fellow that hasn't the courage to speak out. Has he said anything yet that sounded like business?'

'No,' faintly answered Cordolia.

'No! Well, then, I'll find out the next time he comes.'

'Oh! ma, don't. Wait a little longer. Maybe he'll speak out. He said something to-night.'

'He did! What was it?'

'Why, he said that every man ought to marry, and that he—' Then the trembling girl suddenly paused and commenced blushing.

'Come, come, now! No nonsense,' sharply uttered her mother. 'What next?'

'Why, then he sneezed,' murmured the girl.

'Sneezed, did he? What did he say after he sneezed? speak out now.'

'Why, I believe he said he had an awful cold in his head.

'Bah!' contemptuously repled the disappointed mother, and then in a husky voice she exclaimed:

'Go to bed, Cordolia; go to bed immediately, but remember this, if your courting business is not settled before that coal is all gone, I'll take a hand it. Mind that, now.'

Figures are what is wanted

Not election majorities, but such as interest the great army of American producers. Twenty-five years ago the eight counties of Missouri, now traversed by the Old Reliable Hanibal & St. Joseph Railroad were nearly a wilderness. To-day, by a late census, it is discovered that these counties produce over one-fourteenth of the entire wheat crop of the entire State, over one-twelfth of the corn crop, and over one-ninth of the oats. The same growth of country is now being repeated in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and New Mexico, and the immortal Greeley had this identical route and section of country in mind when he breath those stirring words of wisdom, "Young man, go West." Therefore, it is but naturla that parties taking this advice should desire to pass over a road that has done so much for a great State, (especially as it offers the best facilities) and see for themselves. By the Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad, through cars are run from Cleveland and Toledo, and thro' connections made from Cincinnati and Indianapolis, via Quincy, to St. Jo., Atchison and Kansas City, and from Chicago to Kansas City without change. We are about to issue, in connection with our own, a county map of Colorado and New Mexico, giving valuable information as regards time tables, routes, distances, altitudes, &c., which we will be pleased to furnish free, upon application in person or by letter addressed to

T. PENFIELD, G. P. & T A.
Hannibal, Mo.

One of our country exchanges tells of a lady teacher not far from here who kisses the first boy that gets to school in the morning, and the small boys are crowded out by children of larger growth, who roost on the fence all night so as to be up early.' That's just what might be expected from such a demoralizing practice. Next they'll be kissing the last one there at night, and there is no telling where it will end.

A HOME.

BY SUSAN COOLIDGE.

What is a home? A guarded space
  Wherein a few, unfairly blest,
Shall sit together, face to face,
  And bask and purr and be at rest?

Where cushioned walls rise up between
  Its inmates and the common air,
The common pain, and pad and screen
  From blows of fate or winds of care?

Where Art may blossom strong and free,
  And pleasure furl her silken wing,
And every laden moment be
  A precious and peculiar thing?

And past and future, softly veiled,
  In hiding mists shall float and lie,
Forgotten half, and unassailed
  By either Hope or Memory,

While the insistent [illegible]
  [illegible], untrue,
Forbidden her [illegible]
  All for the pleasure of a few?

Can it be this—the longed-for thing
  Which wanders on the restless foam,
Unsheltered beggars, birds on wing,
  Aspire to, dream of, christen "Home!"

No. Art may bloom, and peace and bliss;
  Grief may refrain and Death forget;
But if there be no more than this,
  The soul of home is wanting yet.

Dim image from far glory caught,
  Fair type of fairer things to be,
The true home rises in our thought,
  A beacon for all men to see.

Its lamps burn brightly in the night;
  Its fire-glows unchidden shed
Their cheering and abounding light
  On homeless folk uncomforted.

Each sweet and secret thing within
  Gives out a fragrance on the air—
A thankful breath, sent forth to win
  A little smile from others' care.

The few, they bask in closer heat;
  The many catch the farther ray,
Life higher seems, the world more sweet,
  And hope and heaven less far away.

So the old miracle anew
  Is wrought on earth and proven good,
And crumbs apportioned for a few,
  God-blessed, suffice a multitude.

MY GREAT AUNT'S WILL.

I am a clerk in a country store, and sometimes I wish I'd been a martyr in those days when they stretched people on beds of spikes or roasted them on a gridiron. Then I think I could have taken a little comfort in life.

This is the way of it: I am behind the counter on the side where we keep prints, and there trots up to the opposite side, where we keep flannels, a customer neither young nor beautiful; I hurry around and across, and she asks for calicoes; then I turn her about and make my way back, and I pull down half a dozen pieces, but she just gazes at the shelves, says she'd like to look at the under piece on the top shelf; I climb up, at the risk of breaking my neck, and get the under piece out, and she concludes 'tisn't what she thought it was. Then she says she'd like to look "at that stripe;" I blunder on to every other stripe before I get her particular stripe. Then she says she wants a little figure, and I get all the little figures out for her. She wants to know how much 'tis a yard; I say 'tis 6 cents, and she says she can get better in Springfield for 5 cents, and she looks at me suspiciously, as if I was a cheating youth. She wants to know if it'll wash; and I say I presume so; most calico does wash, and she looks at me indignantly, as if I was a saucy youth. Then she asks me if we take eggs, and I say we do, and we pay 28 cents, and she says they're paying 30 cents at the other store; and off she goes, and I put up the prints, and am down at the farther end of the room turning fragments out of a cracker barrel, when back she comes and wants samples.

We keep the postoffice, and, by the time I get back to my cracker barrel, in comes a man who wants to know if he hasn't a letter. He never had a letter in his life, and he knows it, and I know it; but it is one of those facts that both parties ignore, and I go and look, and give him the consoling assurance that he hasn't any, and he departs in peace of mind.

Then there is a lady who wants to match a confounded bit of silk braid, drab bordering on the lilac. It takes me five minutes to find one box of silk braid, and five more to find we haven't drab bordering on the lilac. Then she wants sewing-silk the same shade, and I hunt through all the sewing-silks, and there's drab bordering on everything else under the sun except lilac; but I know by the way her flounces sweep out that a mercantile house not keeping drab bordering on the lilac stands very low.

I get down to the farther end of the store again, and there comes a man to the front door, and yells out loud enough for every customer to hear that he's brought back that barrel of flour; says the bread was black and all dough in the middle. Now that man understood when he had that flour that it was inferior quality, not recommended, and he had it cheap, and took it because it was cheap. I help him roll the flour in, and I can see that he thinks he has circumvented a villain.

That's the way it goes day after day, week after week, and I hate tea, detest saleratus, abhor codfish, and wish calico, cotton cloth, drilling, hooks and eyes, and all the rest of the wretched necessities of an artificial civilization were at the bottom of the Indian ocean. I long to be a savage more than I do to be an angel, and I shall be, one of these days, though I do wear cloth suits, and have a shaving-mug at the barber's marked in gilt letters, S. O. Haynes. I wonder that all self-respect and sentiment of humanity hasn't long ago perished from out my bosom.

Such were my reflections one fine morning just after train time, while I was weighing out half a pound of black tea, when my fellow-sufferer in the dry-goods and grocery infliction called out:

"Here's a lady inquiring for you, Sam."

In distant outline before the door stood a little woman, her skirts spread out by a triangular hoop like the skirts of the female figures we used to draw on our slates at school. I came up to make my bow, and saw she had deposited a brown willow basket on the show-case and dropped a black glazed bag at her side. She wore a stringy kind of shawl, with fearfully long fringe, and seemed to be afflicted with numb palsy.

"Are you my nephew Sam'wel?" asked she.

"My name is Samuel Haynes, ma'am."

"I'm your father's aunt, Loueezer Haynes."

"I'm glad to see you, Aunt Louisa."

She looked at me sharply, as if I was making fun of her. I suppose it is because the corners of my mouth turn up people are always suspecting me of making fun of them. I wish those corners would sink, and wonder they don't.

"I'm your only living female relative on the father's side," said she.

My business experience with females had been so embittering, I was glad to learn she was the only one on the father's side.

"As you've no mother, I feel it my duty to help make a home for you."

Instantly I remembered that Aunt Louisa was worth seventy-five thousand. I think I learned that fact in early years at the paternal knee, along with who made me, and what State I lived in. I know it always stood to my infantile consciousness in the relation of a primary truth. My father, all his life, courted poverty through the medium of dry goods and groceries, and went through bankruptcy as often as the law would allow. During the periodic seasons, before calling the creditors and making an assignment, he used to clasp his hands to his head and ejaculate, "Louisa might help me if she only would!"

But Louisa wouldn't, or at least didn't, and, whatever may be thought of her filial affection, mature observations on the oscillations in the molasses and ginger market have convinced me of the soundness of her judgment.

"I'm delighted to see you, Aunt Louisa. I'll go right down to my boarding place with you."

Hence, with a brown willow basket in one hand and a shiny leather bag in the other, and my great-aunt trotting behind—why under heavens she didn't walk by my side I couldn't see!—we meandered down the street.

We met Evelina Angelina Plimpton. I was engaged to Evelina Angelina. I had enjoyed that honor ever since one July evening when there came up a sudden thunder-shower, and she clasped my arm and ejaculated she was "so tim-id." An engagement was an annual episode with Evelina. When I solemnly asked Pa Plimpton's consent he didn't remove his pipe from his mouth, but just nodded and pursued his previous train of thought. Evelina smiled patronizingly upon me. Deference to the aged I knew she considered beautiful.

My aunt didn't like my boarding place, and wasn't pleased with my boarding-mistress. She thought we'd better keep house, and I spent the next fortnight house-hunting with her. The great desideratum seemed to be the right kind of a "buttery;" one would have supposed butter was to be the staff of life with us. We at last found a "buttery" on the northwest corner, opening into both kitchen and dining-room, having the requisite number of cupboards, having shelves that admitted of being taken out in house-cleaning time, painted a bewitching cream-color; and we engaged that buttery, regardless of cost or of the character of the neighbors.

The next momentous step was to get my aunt's "things" removed. Were I writing a scientific essay on psychological distinctions of sex, I should make one strong point the tenacious attachment of the feminine mind to "things." Ten thousand dollars in stocks and bonds at stake in an unsettled estate have been known to excite less interest and create less jealousy than the disposition of an odd tablecloth.

My aunt was for some days in a harrowing state of indecision as to whether she had better have her things invoiced as freight or hire a car. By virtue of the handsome figures I learned to make at commercial college, I proved to her it would be cheapest to hire the car. I ahd to go to her former place of abode to see about getting the things en route, and I had to "meet them with a carriage" at our depot. I felt like a collector of antiquities just getting an assortment over from Egypt. I shall ever feel grateful to the small boys of our village for their self-restraint on this tempting occasion. I don't recollect a single opprobrious epithet. They treated my loads with a respect to which nothing but hoary hairs could entitle them.

There was a cheese-press, and I don't know but a cider-mill; there was something, with four tremendously heavy legs, I always believed to be something in disguise of a bedstead. There were seven bandboxes (four large and three small), five feather-beds, seventeen comfortables, and a great deal of crockery which evidently came over in the Mayflower, but had much better have put back to land in the Speedwell.

I need not say that our residence when furnished was neat but not gaudy. I slept under a "rising-sun" bed-quilt, and had a round broideerd mat to put my feet on when I got out in the morning. I sighed for my former cosy quarters, but I remembered my aunt's valuation, and reasoned that, if she was my only living female relative on the father's side, I must of necessity be her only living male relative on the mother's side.

Soon after we were domesticated, I found that my aunt was subject to mysterious attacks, which attacks invariably seized her in the night-time, and made it imperative that I should run for the doctor. Liability to these attacks precluded the possibility of my being away from home evenings, excepting Sunday and Thursday evenings, when I was expected to see my aunt to prayer-meetings and attend her home, though Evelina went off in an opposite direction with another fellow. I didn't know but justice both to myself and Evelina demanded that I should have a conversation with my aunt, and set before her, in language which even a child might understand, my views of the duties and privileges of an engaged man; but I felt extremely doubtful of her sympathy, and $75,000 was a good deal to risk.

We had one servant, whose wages my aunt thought it right I should pay, because, as she said, if there was no one but herself, she shouldn't keep a girl. Our cuisine was managed with strict regard to economy. We lived largely upon soup, which consisted principally of broth. My aunt highly esteemed marrow-bones. I wonder if it is generally known among physiologists how long a healthy person can subsist on a persistently boiled marrow-bone?

For two or three years I had been in the habit of smoking a single cigar at the close of the day's labors. One evening I was sitting on the piazza indulging in this luxury, when out came my aunt.

"Sam'wel!" cried she, "are you smoking?"

"Yes'm," very meekly.

"Well," said she, calmly but firmly, "none of my money shall ever go up in cigar smoke." Then again, "How much do you pay for cigars?"

"Ten cents."

"Now, Sam'wel, I want you to take your pencil and calculate how much 10 cents a day will amount to in a year, then how much in fifty years; then I want you to put this sum at compound interest, and see how much it will amount to by the time you are 75 years of age."

It struck me that I had somehow, during my lifetime, met with similar problems, but I conscientiously made the calculation.

"Aunt," cried I, "I'm perfectly appalled. Never did I dream of this. Of what mad extravagance have I been guilty!" and wildly I hurled my cigar into the camomile bed.

It became generally known throughout our village that my aunt was wealthy and I was heir-expectant, and I soon perceived that, whether or not I ever obtained the gold, I was going to have the glory. At a town meeting, legally called, and with the Moderator in the chair, I was elected one of the nine prudential committee-men; duty—"to see about getting the wood." Our Sabbath-school appointed me delegate to a conference at Cummingford; privileges—lose my time, pay my own fare, change cars twice, stage it five miles over a country road and through a November landscape; prospects—address by Deacon Thomas Jones; music, that rare and intricate composition, "Shall we gather at the river?"

I secured the position of watchman at our store every other Sunday night. Aunt asked me if I expected extra pay for this service, and I said I did. Evelina had talked of green reps for our parlor, but I found that calculations had now ascended to some kind of rose-colored something, value about treble that of the reps.

Aunt was at length seized with an "attack" of more than ordinary violence. I called three physicians, for I shrank from exposing myself to the irresponsible village gossip which might accuse me of not employing every effort for the prolongation of her life. With three doctors in attendance, she not unreasonably felt that this attack would prove final, and sent for a lawyer. I was in a state of great nervous trepidation.

"Is there anything I can do for you, aunt?"

"Nothing now."

"Has your nurse arranged your pillows quite comfortable?"

"Perfectly comfortably."

Solemn scenes have no place in this narrative, and I pass on to the time when we were assembled for the reading of the will—the lawyer, the doctor, the minister, and myself. The instrument ran as follows:

> After paying my just dues and my funeral expenses, and providing a suitable monument, I give and bequeath to my beloved nephew, Samuel O. Haynes, his heirs and assigns, for their use and behoof forever, all my wearing apparel and personal ornaments, with the exception of my gold beads, which I bequeath to my namesake, Louisa Haynes, of St. Joseph, Missouri; all my beds and bedding, household utensils, and furniture, with the exception of my great arm-chair, which, as it came in on the Jones side, I wish to go to some deserving member of that family. I also give my nephew Samuel $5, with which to buy a reference Bible in my remembrance, and also the sealed paper of instructions accompanying this instrument, which I wish him to read a year hence in the presence of the witnesses now assembled for the reading of this my will.
> The remainder of my property, both real and personal, with the exception of the legacies hereinbefore named, I bequeath to the American Missionary Society, neither legacies nor bequests to be paid until a year and a day hence.

When the lawyer was through reading, I had no clear idea to whom these legacies were devised, but I remarked that the American Missionary Society was a most worthy organization.

The nature of the will was soon made public. Popular sentiment was that of resignation, not to say of satisfaction, on my account. My companions, who had never seen why deserving merit in my case should meet such disproportionate reward, while their own plodded along on a weekly stipend with no great-aunt's estate in prospective, naturally experienced a revival of confidence in the equitable government of the universe. Elderly friends in church and Sabbath-school felt that I had cause for rejoicing in being spared the snares and temptations which accompany wealth. My employer privately expressed the opinion that I had been getting above my business, and he was glad to see me taken down a peg. Evalina said, "Never mind; we don't care for money." But, not many days after, Evelina told me she had begun to realize what a solemn ordinance was matrimony; she and I were both young, and had our way to make, and she thought perhaps, for the present, it would be better for us to consider ourselves only friends.

I said, "Very well," and felt that I was a lonely bark tossed on a wild and watery waste.

I had read of instances similar to mine where the sealed packet or the old Bible proved to contain bank-notes; but, finger the paper left me as I would, I could make nothing of it but paper.

For a year I went calmly and hopelessly forward in the dry-goods and grocery way, and we then assembled for the opening of my sealed orders—the lawyer, the doctor, the minister, and myself. The first words that met my eyes as I unfolded the paper were, "And all former wills by me made I do hereby revoke," etc. With palpitating heart I passed the document to the lawyer. After provisions and legacies similar to those in the first instrument, this latter document proceeded as follows:

> To the American Missionary Society I give and bequeath the sum of $25,000.
> To my beloved nephew, Samuel O. Haynes, who I hope may have learned, during the year that has elapsed, lessons of wisdom more valuable than money, I bequeath the sum of $25,000, which I direct my executor to pay over to said Haynes as soon as may be convenient. I further direct my executor to annually pay to said Haynes the income from the remainder of my property, both real and personal, and to pay from the principal to said Haynes on his thirtieth birthday, if he be living, or to his heirs or assigns, if deceased, the sum of $25,000, and to pay to said Haynes on his thirty-fifth birthday the remainder of my property, be it more or less.

I went down to the store just as usual the next morning, for I wished to show people that I had too good sense to have my head turned. When I filled our best customer's molasses jug with kerosene, I knew I had demonstrated my coolness.

The Chairman of the Board of Selectmen wanted to know what I should advise in regard to building the Piper stone bridge; the doctor asked what my candid opinion was concerning the comparative merits of muriate of ammonia and iodide of potassium in a case of pleuritis where egophony denotes slight effusion, but with strong indications of adhesion of the mediastinum; and the minister said there was an article on "Semi-Pelagianism in the Fourteenth Century," in the "Bibliotheca Sacra," he thought I would enjoy perusing. As I stood on the hall doorstep after singing-school that evening, Evelina came out back of me, and, said she, with a little shiver,

"Oh, how dark it is!"

It flashed across me, as I offered my arm for escort home, that to the feminine imagination matrimony on the income of $75,000 is naturally a less "solemn ordinance" than on a precarious salary of $8 a week, and nothing found but peppermint-drops.

Recently Evelina [illegible], "Aren't you very lonely since your aunt died?"—tender emphasis on the lonely. My aunt had been dead a year, and Evelina "engaged" at least once in the meantime.

"Not at all; my time and attention are likely to be entirely absorbed in business."

"No one can rejoice more sincerely in your good fortune than I do, Samuel."

"I don't doubt it, Evelina; I shall always feel confident of your friendship."

I leave Evelina at her cottage-gate, and I feel that,

> "Of all the glad words of tongue or of pen,
> The gladdest are these, 'It wasn't to have been.'"

The next afternoon my employer invited me to be seated behind the railing that fenced in our office, and, said he, laying his hand on my shoulder with a confidential, a parental, a sacrificial air:

"Samuel, I have been reflecting upon my duty to you. You are a young man just starting in life, and starting in some respects under favorable circumstances, but everything depends upon your starting right. You have always been faithful to my interests, and I have determined to show my appreciation of that faithfulness. I have decided to sell out to you!"

A glance at the door showed me that the way of escape was not cut off.

"With all the varied interests of the business you are already familiar; we are yearly drawing in more of the trade from surrounding towns; we have the confidence of our customers; we can buy to the best advantage. To all these privileges you will succeed. Rarely is there such an opening for a young man. Consult our books, consider our profits, reflect upon the income from the post-office—"

"Sir," interrupted I, in thunderous tones; "by the blessing of Providence and the benevolence of my aunt, who is to have a monument that will bring a glow to the bosom of the President of our Cemetery Association, I am now the recipient of a modest competence, and shall I squander more years of precious life on vulgar, soul-wearying dry goods and groceries, subject ever to the fluctuations of Amoskeags and Pepperells, or shall I retire on my income and avail myself of the humanizing influences of leisure and culture? Conscience and the voice of reason within my soul cry, 'Live on your income!' Never more will I lift my aching eyeballs to scan yon top shelf for cotton-batting and Agawam mixed; never shall my trembling fingers seek to fit on warped pasteboard box covers; never shall my wearied ears be greeted by the ceaseless tinkle of the money-drawer bell, or my sated nostrils by the odors of the grinding coffee! No more shall the brown-paper bag and the white-cotton string mingle in all my dreams! Sir, I hate tea, detest saleratus, abhor codfish, and loathe that post-office and 3-cent stamps!"

I was done, and I knew by the hush that fell upon that store that, whatever else I might be, I was an—orator.—Harper's Magazine.

Evening Newspapers.

There seems to be no better investment for money in cities of the second class than a cheap evening newspaper affords. The most profitable newspaper in Washington is the Star, a twilight organ which sells for 2 cents. In Indianapolis the News, a similar publication, has the vogue, and in Detroit another News of the same kind is at the top of the heap. The success of the last-named paper is, indeed, a marvel of journalism. It is now only a little over three years old, yet it claims, and we have no doubt can substantiate, an average circulation of 17,000. The circulation of each day is conspicuously printed in the editorial columns, and any person is at liberty to inspect the books of the office for verification. All these papers are admirable news-condensers. They put everything in a small compass, and find room, after disposing of the news of the day, to print pithy editorials and pungent paragraphs, besides laying hold of all the gossip that is going. This makes an evening newspaper that any man may enjoy and be brief about it, which, it seems, is the kind of journal that most people would prefer to have after work.—Chicago Tribune.

A Question of Privilege.

A singular discovery was made by a young lady, at Watertown, N. Y., the other evening. A young gentleman called on her and spent two very agreeable hours. About 10 o'clock, the old folks having retired, he concluded it time also to leave his charmer. The young lady accompanied him to the door, bade him good-night, and then passed up-stairs to her chamber. Some minutes later she had occasion to visit the dining-room, when, on entering, horror of horrors! she was utterly confounded to see the young gentleman she had so recently bidden good-night sitting in one corner with the servant girl on his lap. She gets less pay at the other place, but she has more privileges.

A Turkish Joke.

The Turks have a strange idea of humor. On Christmas day a Turkish gendarme, enraged with the Christian Mayor of the village of Brankortsi, Bulgaria, gave him a severe beating, saddled and bridled him, and compelled the poor wretch to carry him up and down the street. He finally drove him to the village inn, and throwing the reins to the hostler ordered him to walk the horse up and down. The landlord ventured to interfere, but was knocked down for his pains. The soldier then ordered hay to be fed to his steed, and the municipal Nebuchadnezzar had to swallow it. The Turkish officers considered this a most excellent joke.

EDUCATION.

Interesting Statistics from the Report of Commissioner Eaton.

Gen. Eaton, the Federal Commissioner of Education, has issued his report for 1876. It shows a total school population in thirty-six States and eight Territories, excluding Delaware, the Indian Territory, New Mexico and Wyoming as not reported, of 14,007,522. The total enrollment of pupils in the public schools of all the States is 8,756,659. The total number of teachers reported is 249,262. In Alabama, Delaware, Kentucky, Nevada and Texas the same salaries are paid for the same work to men and women teachers. The total income for public schools in all the States and Territories, except North Carolina, Idaho, Washington and Wyoming, is $88,646,960. The total expenditures for public schools in the Union, excluding Delaware, Georgia, Missouri, Idaho and the Indian Territory, not reported, is $81,982,954. The value of school property reported from twenty-nine States and six Territories is $173,888,545. Statistics are given of 137 normal schools, with 1,031 instructors and 29,105 students. Fourteen normal schools, including the one in Michigan, each receive an annual appropriation exceeding $17,000. Reports exhibit from 131 commercial and business colleges 594 instructors, 26,109 pupils, and 19,009 volumes in their libraries. There are 95 kindergarten schools of which information is given. These have 215 teachers and 2,809 pupils. There is an increase over the number reported last year of 40 schools, 91 teachers and 1,173 pupils. Forty-one schools for the deaf and dumb are reported. These have 293 instructors, 36 of whom are semi-mutes, 5,087 pupils. There are 29,640 volumes in libraries; value of grounds, buildings and apparatus, $6,136,815; amount of State appropriations during the year, $1,049,524; amount received from tuition fees, $94,520. Twenty-nine schools for the blind, with 498 instructors and other employes, and 2,054 pupils, report. The value of grounds, buildings and apparatus is $3,393,467; appropriations during the year, $551,786. A statistical table affords information of 278 other institutions, classed as follows: Orphan asylums, 154; soldiers' orphans' homes, 17; infant asylums, 12; miscellaneous charities, 71; industrial schools, 24. The number of inmates reported in these institutions is 54,204, under the supervision of 1,789 teachers and officers. The income reported for last year was $2,794,264; the expenditures, $3,633,687. Eighteen States and the District of Columbia report 47 reform schools. Reports were received from 9 schools for the feeble-minded. The whole number of inmates is 1,372, under the supervision of 317 instructors and other employes. The Commissioner remarks that the effect of the financial depression throughout the country is seen in the reduction of the amount of benefactions for educational purposes during the year now closing, the total being $4,126,562. In 1874 it was $6,053,304, and in 1872, $11,226,977. In educational benefactions Pennsylvania stands far before the other States for the past year, showing the amount of $810,672. The nearest to this is New Hampshire, with $475,760.

The Rage for Blue Glass.

The "blue-glass" mania still rages. Somebody must be benefited—or fancy so—for violet-colored windows are on the increase, and the trade in blue glass is uncommonly brisk. Strange cures are reported, and the science journals are telling us the profound folly of the whole thing. There must be two sides to make a discussion. We trust we shall not infringe any copyright by culling for our readers some poetical views of the "blue-glass cure" which are floating through the press:

"Everybody now is 'blue glass' wild,
From oldest woman to youngest child;
It cures all diseases, dyspepsia and gout,
And puts physicians completely to rout."

"Like hydropathy
And planchette weird,
The blue-glass ray
Will have its day,
And pass away."

"Little Boy Blue, come blow your glass,
The sheep's in the meadow, the cow's in the grass.
If you take panes, the doctors can keep Locked in the drug store fast asleep."

"Spread the glad tidings throughout the land,
And let there be music by the band;
Blue glass, blue glass, 'tis all the rage,
And the greatest discovery of the age!"

Fractional Currency Lost.

The examination of the fractional currency redeemed since the issue of silver makes it probable that not less than $10,000,000 of the first, second and third issues have been lost or destroyed, as well as $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 of the fourth and fifth issues. The issue of silver began in April. Since that time to Feb. 1, of every $1,000 of the fractional currency of the fifth issue $606.08 has been redeemed; of every $1,000 of the fourth, $365.01; of the third, $10.73; of the second, $0.81, and of the first, $0.83. If the calculations made above of the loss or destruction of $15,000,000 of fractional currency be correct, there were left in circulation only $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 on Feb. 1.

"A Slight Cold," Coughs.

Few are aware of the importance of checking a cough or "SLIGHT COLD," which would yield to a mild remedy, but, if neglected, often attacks the lungs. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" give sure and almost immediate relief.

THERE are probably a hundred or more persons in this and neighboring towns, who daily suffer from the distressing effects of kidney troubles, who do not know that Johnson's Anodyne Liniment is almost a certain cure. In severe cases, great relief may be obtained, if not a perfect cure.

WE notice that the agricultural papers all over the country recommend the use of Sheridan's Cavalry Condition Powders.—Exchange. Farmers and others in this section have long known and appreciated the advantage of these powders over all others.

LAME and painful backs, and weakness across the kidneys, are relieved by Collins' Voltaic Plasters, which are worth a regiment of doctors and acres of plants and herbs in the treatment of such cases.

Wonders of Modern Science.

The perfect accuracy with which scientists are enabled to deduce the most minute particulars in their several departments appears almost miraculous, if we view it in the light of the early ages. Take for example the electro-magnetic telegraph—the greatest invention of the age. Is it not a marvelous degree of accuracy which enables an operator to exactly locate a fracture in a submarine cable nearly three thousand miles long? Our venerable "clerk of the weather" has become so thoroughly familiar with those most wayward elements of nature that he can accurately predict their movements. He can sit in Washington and foretell what the weather will be to-morrow in Florida or New York, as well as if several hundred miles did not intervene between him and the places named. And so in all departments of modern science, what is required is the knowledge of certain signs. From these the scientists deduce accurate conclusions regardless of distance. A few fossils sent to the expert geologist enable him to accurately determine the [illegible] from which they were taken. He can describe it to you as perfectly as if a chart of it were lying on his table. So also the chemist can determine the constitution of the sun as accurately as if that luminary were not ninety-five million miles from his laboratory. The sun sends certain signs over the "infinitude of space," and the chemist classifies them by passing them through the spectroscope. Only the presence of certain substances could produce these solar signs. So also, in medical science, diseases have certain unmistakable signs or symptoms, and by reason of this fact, Dr. Pierce, of the World's Dispensary, has been enabled to originate and perfect a system of determining, with the greatest accuracy, the nature of chronic diseases without seeing and personally examining his patients. He has spared neither pains nor expense to associate with himself, as the Faculty of the World's Dispensary, a large number of medical gentlemen of rare attainments and skill—graduates from some of the most famous Medical Colleges and Universities of both Europe and America. By aid of Dr. Pierce's system of diagnosis, these physicians and surgeons annually treat, with the most gratifying success, many thousands of invalids without ever seeing them in person. In recognizing diseases without a personal examination of the patient they claim to possess no miraculous powers. They attain their knowledge of the patient's disease by the practical application of well-established principles of modern science to the practice of medicine. And it is to the accuracy with which this system has endowed them that they owe their almost world-wide reputation for the skillful treatment of all lingering or chronic affections. This system of practice, and the marvelous success which has been attained through it, demonstrate the fact that diseases display certain phenomina, which, being subjected to scientific analysis or synthesis, furnish abundant and unmistakable data to guide the judgment of the skillful practitioner aright in determining the nature of diseased conditions. The amplest resources for treating lingering or chronic diseases, and the greatest skill, are thus placed within the easy reach of every invalid, however distant he or she may reside from the physicians making the treatment of such affections a specialty. The peculiarities of this scientific system of practice are fully explained in the Appendix of "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser"—a book of over nine hundred large pages, which is so popular as to have reached a sale of almost one hundred thousand copies within a few months of its first publication. It is sent (post-paid) by the Author to any address, on receipt of one dollar and fifty cents. Address, R. V. Pierce, M. D., World's Dispensary, Buffalo, N. Y.

ADDRESS OF THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC COMMITTEE.

WASHINGTON, March 4.

At the caucus of the Democratic members of the House of Representatives, held on the 3d of March, 1877, the following address was unanimously adopted.

[illegible], Chairman.
[illegible]
[illegible]

At a meeting of the members of the National Democratic Committee, held on the 3d day of March, 1877, the following address was unanimously adopted. A. S. HEWITT, Chairman.
F. O. PRINCE, Secretary.

To the American People:

We submit to the country the following review of the events which have resulted in the [illegible] elected President of the United States. In the late political canvass two facts stood out prominently: First, the Republican party, true to its sectional nature, sought to unify the North against the "solid South," and while engaged [illegible] probable [illegible] in the North by dividing the votes of the South. This division it sought to effect by the unconstitutional use of the army in South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana; second, the troops were sent to those States when there was neither invasion nor domestic insurrection to require them. With Legislatures easily to be convened the only demand for their presence was made by the State Executive. The elections in these States, therefore, were held in the shadow of military power. The bayonets glistened at the polls. In depositing their ballots the citizens enjoyed only such liberty as the army permitted. In other States the elections were unusually peaceful. Immediately afterward the result showed that 196 Tilden electors had been chosen, and of the whole popular vote they received a majority of more than a quarter of a million, and of that of the Caucasian race, which controls every other Christian and civilized Government of the world, they received a majority of more than 1,000,000. On the day succeeding election it was announced by the Chairman of the Republican National Committee that 184 Tilden and 185 Hayes electors had been chosen. Nothing had then been learned of the election excepting the vote actually cast. It has never since been disputed that by that vote a majority of Tilden electors had been appointed. Such an announcement, therefore, could only have been made in pursuance of an arrangement to change the vote shown to have been given by the people. We charge that after the true result had been proclaimed a conspiracy was formed by the Republican leaders to reverse the decision made at the polls. The field chosen for the development of this conspiracy was the States of Florida and Louisiana. The persons to act with the original conspirators were the Governors and members of the Returning Boards of those States. The field was well chosen. The State officers selected were suitable persons for the work to be done. For more than ten years these States had been subjected to Governments not of their choice. Taxation and maladministration had robbed them of their substance and well-nigh destroyed their spirit and hope. The army of the United States had been freely used to maintain those Governments in their acts of corruption and usurpation. It was believed that its services would aid in the designed conspiracy. The names of the officers depended upon are Marcellus L. Stearns, Samuel B. McLinn and Clayton A. Cowgill, of Florida; William Pitt Kellogg, J. Madison Wells, Thos. B. Anderson, E. Casanave and J. B. Kenner, of Louisiana. These men were not strangers to the American people. They had before usurped authority. The Returning Boards of those States had made themselves bywords in the land. The Governors were known to be pretenders. If there were two names dishonored in general estimation, they were the names of Wm. Pitt Kellogg and J. Madison Wells. To such men was the work of consummating the conspiracy confided. They entered upon their task with alacrity. Advised and encouraged by leading "visiting" Republican statesmen of the North, they took each step with deliberation and apparent regard for law. Before the election in Louisiana William Pitt Kellogg and his subordinates assumed exclusive control of the execution of the Registry law. They refused registration to thousands entitled to it, and added thousands to the lists who had no right to vote. On the day of election the polls were managed by officials appointed by the Governor. These were, in nearly every instance, members of the Republican party. United States Marshals swarmed at every precinct when thought necessary, under a pretense of preserving the peace, but in fact to intimidate voters. Ballot-boxes were stuffed in the interest of the Republican candidates. The poll-books were falsified in some instances and then returned to the Canvassing Board, while in other cases the returns giving Democratic majorities were withheld from the canvassers altogether. After the returns had been delivered to the board they remained in its exclusive possession, and while there they were opened with its consent and the original papers abstracted and false ones substituted in their stead. When the returns were opened, the board, with an appearance of fairness, permitted persons representing both parties to be present, but when the decision was made as to what should be counted secret sessions were held from which every Democrat was excluded, although the law constituting the board required that it should be composed of representatives of both political parties. In counting the votes it exercised powers not conferred by the statute, and in a most flagrant disregard of truth and justice the members of the board changed the poll-books so that the Republican officers appeared to be chosen when their opponents had in fact been elected. They forged the names of officers to the certificates of election. They threw out votes of precincts upon affidavits which they knew had been fraudulently returned. Indeed, they themselves ordered false affidavits to be made hundreds of miles from the place at which they purported to have been taken, in order that the decision might appear justified which they had in advance determined to make. They arbitrarily threw out votes where there was no preliminary statement from the Commissioners of Election to give them jurisdiction. They corruptly, in order to elect favorites, and to correct the mistakes of certain Republicans in voting for electors, added to the lists votes which had never been cast.

While considering the case the members of the board endeavored to enter into negotiations with both the Republican and Democratic National Committees to sell their decision. A half million of dollars was the price asked. Not obtaining it, they tried to bargain with the leading Democrats of Louisiana to elect the State ticket of their party. J. Madison Wells, with the approval of Thomas C. Anderson, offered to elect the Nicholls State ticket for two hundred thousand dollars cash in hand. The money was not paid. Negotiations were then renewed, if ever broken off, with the leaders of the Republican party. The result was declared in its favor. The chief conspirator, J. Madison Wells, admitted that he had been paid by that organization for his decision. In Florida the same frauds characterized the returns and the action of the Returning Board. Votes were thrown out with the same disregard of justice. Besides, in that State it refused to regard the orders of courts of competent jurisdiction and proceeded in the most defiant contempt of judicial authority. In this manner more than one thousand Tilden votes were thrown out in Florida, and more than ten thousand in Louisiana. The votes of those States, in consequence of the conspiracy, which in fact were cast for Tilden, were given to Hayes. The only excuse for this outrageous reversal of the judgment of the people is, that intimidation had been practiced by whites against blacks where the votes were thrown out. Whether this intimidation compelled some persons to vote against their will or prevented some from attending the polls, it afforded in either case no justification for the deliberate rejection of the ballots by the Returning Boards. The statute of Louisiana only authorized proof of intimidation in cases where charges of violence were made in writing by the Commissioners of Elections on the day when the election was held. These charges were to be inclosed to the board in envelopes containing the returns. In a few cases only were the charges made as required. In the rest evidence was received without proper foundation having been laid. The evidence received consisted in the main of affidavits written out by clerks and employes of the Returning Board, without ever having been seen by the persons purporting to certify to them. There was, therefore, no adequate proof of intimidation. It may be remarked [illegible] that the temptation to Kellogg and his Returning Board was very great to manufacture cases of intimidation, for it was only in them that the Democratic majority could be overthrown and the conspiracy be successful. We should not fail to call the attention of the people to the dangerous effect of the doctrine of intimidation in politics. It disqualifies from voting not only parties to the act of intimidation, but all those who have voted at the same precinct with them. Two persons may conclude to make a case of intimidation, and thereby [illegible] rejected. It makes elections a farce. It takes the power from the people to rest in Returning Boards. It enables the latter to impose the severest political penalty, disfranchisement, without giving to the persons punished an opportunity of hearing or trial. A republic deserves to lose its liberties if it tolerates such outrages [illegible]. By this disregard of law, disobedience of courts, and contempt of the rights of voters; by their frauds and corruptions and usurpations; by their briberies and perjuries and forgeries, did the conspirators obtain certificates of election for the Republican candidates in the Southern States named. From the day that certificates were issued to the Hayes electors in Louisiana and Florida the country has been filled with an unprecedented excitement. The people have done little else than engage in discussion as to the fraudulent conduct of the Returning Boards. In this condition of affairs business has been generally suspended, failures have been frequent and prostration has seized upon nearly every interest in the land. When the excitement was at its height Congress assembled. One of its duties was to count the electoral votes of the States, including Florida and Louisiana. With a view of facilitating the count and providing for the peaceful performance of its duty by Congress, a bill was passed creating an Electoral Commission. By that law the commission was to ascertain the true and lawful vote of every State. In this labor it was to exercise as to the hearing of evidence and the examination of papers such power as Congress or either house of Congress possessed. In the belief that evidence would be heard, and that the settlement of the disputed question of facts would be fairly reached, Congress and the people accepted the commission. How that confidence has been disappointed, how a decision has been made based upon a refusal to consider the unfortunate question of dispute, is well known to the country. When the certificates from Florida and Louisiana were opened and submitted to the two houses, objections were filed to those presented by the Hayes electors. Among other grounds of objection, it was urged that these certificates had been fraudulently and corruptly issued by the Returning Boards and Executives of these States, and as a result of a conspiracy between them and the electors claiming to have been chosen; that such certificates had been issued in violation of the laws of the respective States, and that some of the electors named therein were ineligible by the express provision of the constitution of the United States. When these objections were made before the commission proof was offered to the commission to sustain them, but the commission by a vote of 8 to 7 refused to receive the testimony offered except as to the ineligibility of a single member in Florida. It was voted in the case of Louisiana that the commission would not have evidence to show that the Returning Board was an unconstitutional body; that it was not organized as the law requires at the time the vote was canvassed; that it had no jurisdiction to canvass the electoral votes; that the charges of riot, intimidation and violence were false, and that the Returning Board knew that a fact; that the certificates were corruptly and fraudulently issued and as a result of the conspiracy, and that the vote of the State has never been compiled or canvassed. The same rulings substantially were made as in the case of Florida. The commission also refused to hear proof that at the time of the election in South Carolina anarchy prevailed, destroying a republican form of government in that State, and that troops were retained there in violation of the constitution to interfere with the free choice by the electors, so that the lawful vote of the State could not be known. Against these decisions we protest most earnestly in the name of free and republican government. In the first place, they struck a fatal blow at the constitutional power of the two houses to count the electoral vote. This power has been exercised by both houses without dispute from the foundation of the Government. That evidence should be received in cases of contested returns seems clear. The principle has been maintained by the ablest statesmen the country has produced. It was a practice confirmed to principle, notably in case of Louisiana itself in 1869 and 1873. Such evidently was the view of both houses at the present session. The investigating committees were sent to Florida, South Carolina and Louisiana to take testimony and report as to the elections in these States. It is not difficult to see upon what principle this view can be based. The duty of Congress is to count the vote. This makes the enactment of the vote to be counted. This again makes a determination of what is the true vote and the distinguishing of the false from the true. This requires evidence. Forms of law expressing the fact cannot be made unless evidence be admitted, for if fraud possesses the count how can the success of falsehood be prevented if either jury be denied? The action of the commission disables Congress from performing a certain constitutional duty. In the second place, this decision nullifies an article of the constitution. In section 1, article 4, it is provided, "but no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector." If States choose electors who are ineligible, how can this provision be made effectual? The State by its action has refused to enforce it. Manifestly it can then only be enforced by the power authorized to pass upon the vote which the State has returned.

Congress, then, in counting the vote, must determine who are and who are not eligible electors, facts which can only be ascertained by evidence aliunde. Any other doctrine abrogates the previous construction and in effect substitutes the following: "Senators, Representatives, and all persons holding offices of trust or profit under the United States may be appointed electors." In the the third place, the doctrine ignores all precedents and rules of morals, in excluding evidence of fraud submitted. Nothing can stand which is tarnished by fraud. It vitiates everything. It annuls every deed, cancels every obligation, annuls every contract, and reverses every judgment. Every tribunal, however organized, is bound to regard every fraudulent transaction as a nullity, however it may come before it, whether directly in an independent proceeding or collaterally. The decision of the highest tribunal, if procured through fraud, should be treated as of no effect by the humblest court in the land. As said by a distinguished writer, "It matters not whether the judgment impugned has been pronounced by an inferior or by the highest court of the land, but in all cases alike, it is competent for every court, whether inferior or superior, to treat as a nullity any judgment that can be clearly shown to have been obtained by manifest fraud." It remained for the commission to declare that there were certain tribunals which could perpetrate fraud with impunity, and that there was one court which could not lay its hands upon fraud when brought before it for review. Those exceptional tribunals were the Returning Boards of Florida and Louisiana. That exceptional court is the Electoral Commission. Fraud has found an intrenchment from which it cannot be driven in a contest on making choice of the highest officer of the greatest of republics. A doctrine more corrupting in its consequences, more destructive of the purity of elections, and more threatening to the perpetuity of free government, could not easily be suggested. It is sought to justify this decision by an appeal to State sovereignty. The argument is that, as the States choose their electors in their sovereign capacity, their decision cannot be reversed by any other authority. This proposition pushes to its furthest limit the doctrine of States rights. The theory of the most advanced advocates of the school was only that the States were sovereign as to the reserved powers. Over those which were delegated it was conceded that the constitution was supreme. The power to choose electors would not have existed except for the constitution. It was, therefore, a delegated power. The Legislature of a State chooses electors by virtue of the constitutional provision. It is a duty to be performed by the State while in the Union. It cannot perform it before admission, nor after the Union is disrupted. Can it be possible that there is no power in the Union to determine how the duty has been performed, and whether in compliance with the constitutional provision? To assert this doctrine is to declare the absolute independence of the States, to deny the supremacy of the constitution, and to leave the United States powerless against fraud or violence of the States, which may force a President upon the people. The power to review the action of the Electoral Colleges seems necessarily to be derived from the nature of a confederate Government. If one party to the compact possesses a power as to its subject matter superior to the power created by agreement, the compact [illegible] confederacy to exist unless the jurisdiction of its individual members as to powers committed to the confederation is subordinated to the larger jurisdiction of the latter. If, for example, as in this case, one State can exercise its functions as to electing a President in violation of the constitution, without any power in the Union to reverse its action, then a constitution was unnecessary for the delegation of powers, and the nation may be governed in violation of the very instrument which created it. But whatever the power of Congress as to authority over the vote of electors, it is certain that it is not bound to treat as valid a fraudulent certificate. It matters not how absolute the sovereignty under which a fraud is perpetrated. It cannot receive protection nor be granted recognition. If there be a tribunal to which the certificates are submitted, it is bound to treat them as worthless. The certificates were charged to be fraudulent. The commission, if it counted them, gave them validity. It was its duty to to hear the facts to prevent the success of fraud, even though the certificates came from a sovereignty a hundred fold greater than Louisiana or Florida. By these methods, under the forms prescribed by the law constituting the Electoral Commission, Rutherford B. Hayes has been declared President of the United States. His title rests upon the disfranchisement of lawful voters, the false certificates of returning officers acting corruptly, and the decision of a commission which has refused to hear evidence of alleged fraud. For the first time are the American people confronted with the fact of a President fraudulently elected. His inauguration will be peaceable, and in that hour the most infamous conspiracy of all history will receive its crown. In the exciting days just past the forbearance of the people has maintained peace. Let it not, however, from this be understood that the fraud to be consummated on the 4th of March will be quietly acquiesced in by the country. Let no hour pass in which the usurpation is forgotten. Let agitation be necessary, that at every opportunity the people may express their abhorrence of the outrage. Let want of confidence be voted at every election in Mr. Hayes and his administration. Both must be controlled by conspirators, who have elected the one and will organize the other; and whatever of good may come from either will always be darkened by the stain upon the title. Let the Democratic party at once organize for new contests to secure overwhelming victories, that conspirators may never again attempt the experiment which now humiliates the republic, and has installed in its highest office a usurper.

A Hawk Among Hens.

Gilbert White tells a most dramatic story of a neighbor who had lost most of his chickens by a sparrow-hawk that came gliding down between a faggot pile and the end of his house, to the place where his coops stood. The owner, vexed to see his flock diminishing, hung a net between the pile and the house, into which the bird dashed and was entangled. The gentleman's resentment suggested a fit retaliation; he, therefore, clipped the hawk's wings, cut off his talons, and, fixing a cork on his bill, threw him down among the brood-hens. "Imagination," says Mr. White, "cannot paint the scene that ensued; the expressions that fear, rage and revenge inspired were new, or at least such as had been unnoticed before; the exasperated matrons upbraided, they execrated, they insulted, they triumphed. In a word, they never desisted from buffeting their adversary till they had torn him in a hundred pieces."—Scribner for February.

Death at the Age of 104 Years.

Lady Smith, who, had she lived about three months longer, would have completed her 104th year, died in Lowestoft, Eng., on Feb. 3. At the age of 23 she was married to Sir James Edward Smith, who was then a young physician of limited means, but had the courage to purchase, on his own responsibility, the collections of Linnæus, and thus became the founder and first President of the Linnæus Society. He died in 1828, so that Lady Smith, after thirty-two years of wedlock, lived in widowhood for nearly half a century. She had a remarkable constitution. She hardly knew what illness was until within the last three years. She had preserved nearly all her teeth, and her eyesight was good enough to enable her to read the newspapers. At the age of 100 she preserved many traits of her former beauty, and her undimmed eyes and fresh color called forth the admiration of all who saw her.

How to Get New Tools.

The Journal of Progress makes the following rather sarcastic suggestions, which we fear are more generally followed than opposite ones would be: "And now, dear farmers, such of you as are tired of the old tools, let us give you a bit of advice. If you don't take it any better than advice we have given you on former occasions, all right—it will be no great loss to us; so here it is: Do not rub linseed oil on your fork and shovel and rake handles; do not paint your plows and mowers; do not use any rust preventive on the iron and steel parts, and, above all, leave everything out of doors. You have really no idea how quickly you will possess a new set of tools, provided you have a balance in the bank."

A Parisian Night Scene.

Workmen who are tearing down buildings in Paris to make way for the new Avenue de l'Opera labor all through the night. Huge bonfires are lighted on the vacant places whence demolished houses have been removed, and the work of destruction goes on in the glaring blaze. Electric lights are also used to assist the laborers upon the roofs. The clouds of dust constantly arising, the smoke of the bonfires, the glare of the lime lights, and the weird figures of the workmen combine to make a fantastic scene, and nightly crowds gather to gaze at the spectacle.

1,150 NEWSPAPERS

The attention of Advertisers is called to our List of Weekly Newspapers.

Send for a Catalogue.

CUTS AND ELECTROTYPES.

No extra charge for cuts, trade-marks, unusual display or advertisements inserted across two or more columns; only twenty-seven cuts [illegible] are required for the whole number of newspapers. Cuts should not be over two and one-eighth inches in width.

PROMPT INSERTIONS.

Advertisements are, in all cases, sent to all of these papers on the day they are received, and appear in the following issues without any delay.

CHARACTER OF THE PAPERS.

The newspapers are of the better class; the quality of paper furnished them is of a higher price than that used by other concerns; they are better edited by higher-priced men, having greater experience. Their aggregate and average circulation is larger.

AN INTERESTING STATEMENT.

To send an advertising order to 1,150 newspapers would require an investment of $34.50 for postage; stationery would cost nearly as much; the labor of addressing 1,150 envelopes is considerable; to write 1,150 orders would be a great task; to print them would cost something. Our price for a five-line advertisement in the whole 1,150 papers, one week, is $31.50, or $3.00 less than the postage.

NOTICES IN NEWS COLUMNS.

To have an advertisement set up in the form of reading matter and inserted in the news columns of newspapers is a very efficient mode of advertising. These lists of newspapers offer advantages in this respect which no other newspapers or list of newspapers possess. Manufacturers and merchants desiring to publish a description of their wares or establishments will find this plan very serviceable. By publishing a series of brief notices, they can soon make the merits of their goods familiar to the people of the regions in which these papers are published.

CIRCULATIONS.

The circulations given are from the American Newspaper Directory for 1876, and in hundreds of cases are too small. For instance, the Chicago Ledger, which appears at 4,000 circulation, actually issues 13,000 weekly. This is the only list of Co-operative Newspapers which has ever exhibited to the advertiser the circulation of the separate papers, and on this list the actual character of each paper, whether the best or the only paper in a place, is plainly indicated in every case. Three Beautiful Premiums Free to Every Subscriber of this Paper.

The London Publishing Company have just issued three beautiful color Chromatic Works of Art, in the shape of MOTTOES, which, for beauty and worth, are without equal.

The first, GOD BLESS OUR HOME, is in old English type, beautifully embellished with vines and moss running through the entire work. In the center of the first letter "G" is a mother teaching her two children to repeat a prayer, while to her right are two larger children with beautiful flowing robes, singing praise to God. The background of the entire motto is a beautiful Landscape Scene, representing Home.

The second, THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD, is also in old English type, beautifully embellished with vines, ferns and flowers. The central figure is here represented by the Lord as a Shepherd. In His arm He carries the Shepherd's crook and the lost lamb. The effect is most beautiful.

The third, PRAISE THE LORD, is similarly embellished. The central figure in this motto is three beautiful half-grown children, representing angels, singing Praise the Lord.

Size of mottoes, 10x26 inches. Remember we make no charge for the above mottoes, as our arrangement makes them a free premium, the subscriber only being required to pay the actual expense of postage, wrapping and tubing on the premium selected, which amounts to 25 cents each.

AUBURN, INDIANA, MAR. 15, 1877

The Inauguration.

Despite the determined struggle of the so-called filibusters, to prevent a fraudulent President from taking the chair, the day at last arrived on which he was to be inaugurated. A cold chilly wind came down from the north, and the sun made sundry efforts to be present, finally succeeding at the close of the ceremonies, but his cheerless rays added but little to the [illegible]. We looked in vain for that pageant that has heretofore always greeted the coming of a new chief magistrate. The decorations along Pennsylvania avenue were few and scanty, and the banners snapped in the brisk gale in an ominous manner. Inauguration day has always been regarded by the average Washingtonian as the acme of occasions in the capital The city puts on its holiday attire, robes itself in its most gorgeous costume and heralds the coming of the chosen leader, by acclamations of joy. No party is recognized, but all vie with each other as one common citizenship, with gladness in their hearts to give the newly elect a magnificent reception. The regular old fashioned inauguration day would remind you of some great general of old, returning from his conquests to make his triumphal entre amid the plaudits of his subjects, down through the architectural splendor of some of the great cities of the past. But we are obliged to say from reliable information, that the late inauguration was a handsome failure. But two or three military companies from abroad were in attendance and this part of the procession was very limited. In fact the military is about all the procession there was on this day The crowd generally gathered at the portico east of the capitol to witness the ceremonies. About eleven o'clock Hayes came up in a four-in-hand with Grant and was taken to the Senate chamber, where a large audience awaited him. Here the best part of the show was to be seen. The diplomatic corps were in full dress and their bright uniforms of scarlet and gold, made them especially attractive. The galleries were packed with handsomely dressed ladies, Mrs. Hayes being among them. After the usual ceremony of swearing in the Vice President an adjournment was had to the east portico where a large platform had been erected, and around which in the open air, stood thousands, we were going to millions, of negroes, and a few white people. Here Mr. Hayes took the oath and delivered his inaugural address. A few colored men would swing their greasy hats now and then in response to something in the address they did not understand, and with that exception there was no demonstration of any kind And this ended the inauguration of a President, who it will always be said was fradulently placed in that chair. He first stole the office and has since gobbled up Tildens platform, and now we hope he will stand by it, and give those people in the south, whom his party abused and villified all through the campaign last fall, an equal chance with others under the benign institutions of our once great but terribly prostrate country.

There is one thing certain. The Republicans know they must count in a President, or see their party wiped from the face of the earth. But the grand old Democratic party can live without it. With all their thieving and dishonorable actions against it, it came within one of defeating the corrupt party, and now fired with their indignation at these outrages, it will come up four years from now with a certainty of victory. It may be too soon to expect a reaction against the thieves who have stolen the Presidency, but it will surely come, and Democrats should stand faithfully to their posts.

Hayes must recognize either Packard or Nicholls. A new election will be a clear back down from his southern peace policy. If the election in Louisiana was legal enough to elect him to the Presidency it is sufficient to elect a Governor. We had hopes that Hayes had backbone, but there are indications that he wants a new election. A new election for governor, then a new election for President. Perhaps he had better have a commission with Joe. Bradley as the fifth man. Eight to seven always wins.

Commissioners Proceedings.

The County Commissioners met in regular session March 5th, 1877, with a full Board present and transacted the following business:

Criminal Court.

The criminal cases in the Circuit Court, Judge Tousley presiding, seem to have received particular attention this term. We give below a synopsis of the cases disposed of:

Wm. Hackathorn, for burglary, was found guilty, and sent to penitentiary for two years.

The charge of riot against the Culvers and Brittons was dismissed.

Eugene Bradley and Aloes Fisher were found guilty of larceny and fined five dollars.

Jimmy Decker paid $3 for assault and battery.

George Hopnix, our festive George, leaves us for a limited existence at Michigan City. George used to be a good boy, but it was years ago, when his childish prattle made home happy. George has been within reach of the law's claw several times, but a singular fate preserved him, and instead of taking it in small installments he gets it all at once. He has been elected to a term of five years, one year longer than Hayes, but there is a wide difference in the relative positions of the two men. Hayes can be approached and bulldozed by mean office-seekers, but George will be inaccessible to their demoralizing influence. His sentence is a severe one, and we pity him, that a young life should be spent in so limited a sphere. It was proven that he stole several hides, and now he is to hide away to reflect over the folly.

Henry Soloman, charged with stealing an axe, was sent up for one year. Had he axed for the tool he might of passed the time much more pleasantly, solitary and alone in the groves of his native heath.

Charles Lockwood and Wm. Casey, for grand larceny. Lockwood was discharged, but Casey was ordered north for two years.

The cases differ somewhat, the latter did and the former didn't, and this is the reason why they are seperated.

David Sharley for forging a note of two hundred dollars, was given four years to contemplate the unique regularity of a ginuine signature, at the same time singing "Champagne Charley is my name" having a chilling suspecion that champagne enters not into, nor contributes to his coporeal enjoyments.

We regret that a rush of advertising compels us to exclude a few items. The public knowing that the COURIER has the largest circulation, are taking advantage of it as a medium to let the people know how they sell goods.

Our fellow townsman, Mr. Isaac Roth will sell at auction, on Saturday, March 24, a lot of farming implements, household furniture and other articles, at his new brick residence on Main street. Terms made known on day of sale.

Through the mutations of time and accident, Hollister & Benedict occupy the corner of Seventh and Main with their fine new brick. We hope to see another like it go up on the corner this summer.

All parties knowing themselves indebted to J. E. Beugnot must call at Steve Gerardot's and settle within 30 days or their names will be published in this paper under the heading of "Dead Beats."

J. E. BEUGNOT.

If railroad accidents are to happen in the county, we hope they will occur in the vicinity of Corunna. Our correspondent there has written an excellent report of the accident last Friday, which appears in another column, and which we can commend as being reliable.

The Commissioner have at last decided to erect a bridge across Cedar Creek on Seventh street this spring. This will be a much needed improvement, and will make this an important street. It will be continued through Sommers' addition and will make this locality still more attractive for residences.

Notice.

I hereby give notice that I will not pay note given August 28th 1874 to Sophronia J. Heist. Neither will I pay any debts contracted against me by any person, and will not be held responsible for them.

HENRY HEIST.

School commenced again last Monday with [illegible] than [illegible], under the same corps of teachers, with the exception of Miss Murphy, the assistant in the High School, who resigned at the close of the last term, on account of ill health. Her place has been filled by Miss L. A. Powers, a graduate of the State Normal, at Bloomington, Ind.

The following named pupils of the C and D grade of the intermediate department of our school, were neither tardy or absent during the term just closed:

Willie Hoffman, Frederic Merrill, Clinton Potter, Philip Sibert, Frank Fluke, Henry Tess, Flora Hoffman, Bell Lanning, Ada Spake, Pinkie Steele, Amanda Wallborn.

M. K. ZIEGLER, Teacher.

We regret the appearance of an item in last weeks paper, relative to a former employee of this office, now with Weamer. Hank is a good workman and an excellent obliging gentleman, and we have nought to say against him. Sly dabs now then provoked the item, yet would not have appeared by our consent. Every man has the right to regulate his own private matters to suit himself.

On our late arrival here nothing impressed us so much as the architectural beauty of the new Ensley block, east of the court yard. It is certainly the most substantial and best furnished building in the county. The handsome front with its large plate glass windows, is very stylish, and the beautiful cornice makes it very attractive. Such buildings add tone and character to our place and we hope to see more of them in our midst.

David Lower, living near Wawaka, Noble county, being absent one day last week, burglars entered the house and found but an old lady present. With revolvers they made her disclose where $700 were kept. They took it and were gone in twinkling, but the old lady gave prompt alarm, and the neighbors responded, and now those naughty fellows lie in the cold, cold, jail. Mr. Lower is a relation of our townsman Mr. John King.

We learn through a private source that one of our enterprising citizens, no other than Wm. McIntyre, Esq. will enter the grain trade at this place in a short time, and pay the highest market price for wheat, oats, corn etc. Though we have had several already engaged in that line, yet there is no doubt that more dealers of this kind will enhance and enlarge the business of Auburn and make the grain trade lively. This should be the center of the grain trade in DeKalb county and we believe such movements as these will make it so.

Good Advice.

Now is the time of year for Pneumonia, Lung Fever, &c. Every family should have a bottle of BOSCHEE'S GERMAN SYRUP. Don't allow for one moment that cough to take hold of your child, your family or yourself. Consumption, Asthma, Pneumonia, Croup, Hemmorrhages and other fatal diseases may set in. Although it is true GERMAN SYRUP is curing thousands of these dreaded diseases, yet it is much better to have it at hand when three doses will cure you. One bottle will last your family a winter and keep you safe from danger. If you are consumptive, do not rest until you have tried this remedy. Sample bottle 10 cents. Regular size 75 cents. Sold by your Druggist, F. E. Davenport

"Let Justice be Done."

All parties who feel interested in seeing that justice is done to Dr. J. H. Ford, John L. Davis, F. D. Ryan and S. W. Sprott, upon whose endorsement the D. E. R. & I. R. W. was extended from this place to Butler, and whose property is now being executed for about $3,300, the unpaid balance of the debt, which they assumed, in obedience to the request of a public meeting of the citizens of Auburn, held at that time, are requested to meet at H. C. Peterson's Law Office on this Thursday evening, March 15th, 1877, at 7½ p. m. at which time an organized effort will be made to relieve those parties from an unjust burden.

A CARD.

From the Garrett News.

EDITOR NEWS—During my recent acquaintance with the inhabitants of Garrett, I have learned to regard them as among the most intelligent and cultivated people I have found in the associations of life thus far, and am now strengthened in that conviction, and also that they are noble and enterprising in disposition. What they undertake they do on a most liberal scale. It affords me sweet pleasure to acknowledge through the columns of your paper a present from the people of your city, amounting to Eighty-five dollars in cash, and I wish to assure all the friends who participated in this, that the favor is fully appreciated by myself and family, and they shall ever have our warmest sympathies.

J. W. WELCH.

Why suffer with such a dreadful Cough and Cold. For 25 cents you can puchase of your druggist a bottle of Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup, and cure is certain. For sale by F. E. Davenport.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

The First National Bank of Auburn Indiana tenders to the citizens of DeKalb county its facilities for the transaction of business. We loan money, receive deposits subject to check at sight or payable at a fixed date with a stipulated rate of interest. Sell exchange on New York, Chicago, Toledo and Fort Wayne procure such foreign exchange as may be desired, buy exchange and make collections on all available points, and do all usual and ordinary business done by first-class banks. We will also take on deposit for safekeeping valuable papers such as deeds mortgages, notes bonds, agreements etc., guardians, administrators, trustees and all other handling trust funds together with merchants, manufacturers and farmers are solicited to open an account with us. We will deal liberally with all who call.

J. H. FORD, President.
JAMES V. HAZZARD, Cashier.

We have returned again to our editoral duties, and expect to remain permanently unless sooner discharged. We stepped out of office with Grant on the fourth of this month at 12 o'clock m, and we feel as though a heavy burden has been lifted from both of our shoulders. Its not so fine to be President as Hayes will find out and Tilden wont. Grant felt splendid over his release from office, and as he bade us good by at the depot, though a tear trickled down his soldierly cheek, we could see underneath that he was glad he had not to decide who was governor of Louisiana "Tom," he says, "never try to be President, unless you have plenty of relations, and can keep your mouth shut." The last condition forever disqualifies us and we felt that the last hope had fled when he said that. And as the the train swept out of the great city, the tears fell faster, and a yellow bandana waved us a last adieu.

Weamer says the COURIER boys are jealous because he is leaving them in job work. Well how does this look in comparison to your last weeks show up.

S. T. Galloway,	1000 reciepts.
T. Kessler,	500 labels.
Prof. Seiler,	400 cards.
Isaac Roth,	Sale bills.
DeKalb Co.,	100 blanks.
T. H. Strole,	Sale bills.
I. A. Brown,	1000 blank notes.
F. E. Davenport,	200 circulars.
Wm. Flether,	300 patent deeds.

All of the above in the three last days instead of a week.

As to facilities for job work we would be willing to leave that question to the foreman now in Mr. Weamers employ to say if the COURIER office can be beat in the county. And now about circulation. Weamer should say how much circulation he has got, as between 600 and 700 is too indefinite. We say we have 1000, and are ready to prove it. Certainly we send the COURIER outside of the county, to such places as Hamilton where we have about twenty subscribers to Edgerton, ten more, LaOtto, five more, Leo five more, Kandallville 10 more, Pleasant Lak 6 more, Turkey Creek 5 more, many of which live inside the county. The "COURIER" does not stop for county lines and people will have it if they do live outside. Weamer got 65 lbs. of paper last week we got 105. Say 100 papers weighs 10 lbs. then Weamer has 650 and we have 1050, so you see we are four hundred ahead of you in spite of your bragging.

It will be remembered that when the Eel River road finally came to be completed, every means was exhausted by which our citizens could raise sufficient money to bring about this generally wished for consummation. Brave, true men stood by the interests of our town, and worked zealously for the final completion of this road. Four of our citizens, liberal-hearted, enterprising and confident of the integrity of the people they represented, stepped forward, and by making themseves individually and collectively responsible, guaranteed its payment for the town. The work was completed and we reaped the advantage of another line of railroad. Our town sprang up in a few months from an obscure county seat to a thriving little city, and those who had real estate were largely benefited. But the hard times came on and those who had subscribed failed to pay, and thus four guarantors were compelled to carry this debt, and have done so up to the present. Now they ask the people to relieve them of their trust, and they have a right to make the demand. They have acted nobly, unselfishly, and no man who loves truth and honor, no citizen who claims to be a follower of the great master, no individual with a spark of manhood, but will do his utmost, by coming up and helping to relieve these gentlemen of the burden they have borne for the good of the people here. Let a generous impulse be manifested by all, let simple justice be done; put yourself in their place and act speedily and promptly. All have been benefitted, let all help to pay this indebtedness. We hope no one will stand back and see their neighbor do more than he should. A subscription has been started already and we hope to learn that the full amount has been subscribed to meet the case of the guarantors.

CORUNNA.

Antics of the Rail--Collision on the Air Line--Cremation of Mail Matter, Baggage, etc.,--No Lives Lost, but Passengers and Crew Experience a Sensation--Minor Matters in General.

As a slight variation in the day's doings at this sprightly village of commercial transactions, we herewith send you a "railroad accident," the most important item of "thrilling interest." On last Friday afternoon, the eastern bound passenger, train No. 4, collided with the western bound freight near Moody's Crossing, about three-fourths of a mile east of town. It appears that No. 71 was bulletined to make Sedan and there side-track for No. 4; but the engineer forgot his order and pulled through that station for Corunna, with four cars attached (the conductor having applied the brakes at Sedan, causing the train to part asunder) where he met No. 4, as above stated. It will be remembered that the day was well chosen for an accident of the kind, as the wind blew a perfect gale at intervals, sending the snow in every direction and making travel difficult, if not almost impossible. Thus the the two locomotives approached with lightning speed within a few feet of each other before the engineers discovered their impending peril. The air-brakes having been instantly applied, the force of the collision was considerably checked, but as it was the tender of No. 4 was driven into the front of the postal car midway. The engineers had barely time to clear the cabs before the two leviathans came together with a crash, reared and plunged and then toppled over side by side, like two dying gladiators. In the postal car were Senator Howard, postal agent, with his assistant, Mr. Cameron; also Messrs. John Sargeant, U. S. express messenger, and Geo. H. Hubbard, baggage master, prompt attention to the air-brake caused the passenger train to "slack up", and thus the baggage car telescoped the mail car from the rear and crushed in the roof, leaving a cavity from which the occupants were permitted to make their escape. Without this fortunate occurrence they never could have escaped, as the car took fire almost instantly. In conversation with Mr. Howard during the day, while nursing the somewhat damaged portion of his individuality, he expressed a decided belief in divine providence, after mature reflection over the accident. The flames of the mail car soon communicated to the baggage and express cars, consuming all three with the contents entire, within thirty minutes of the collision. The value of the contents of the postal car is not positively known, though we are creditably informed that it will not fall short of $100,000 in government funds, en route from San Francisco to Philadelphia. Of this sum there was about $85 000 in gold coin, in denominations of $20, and the balance consisted of National bank notes, secured in the mail pouches. As the government keeps a record of the number of every note, there will be no material loss in this respect, while of the coin a greater portion has been recovered from the debris of the wreck, though in a damaged condition. Your correspondent, as in duty bound, got "in at the death," having discovered the flames from the railroad bride, soon after the train passed the station at 2.30, and therefore witnessed the cremating process. From three o'clock until twilight on the day of the accident, and all day Saturday, the express messenger, with a detailed force, were engaged in gathering in the "shiners," some of them almost as bright as first when they emerged from the mint, others sadly dimmed by their contact with the fire fiend, and more of them in the condition when first discovered by old Capt. Sutter—slightly boiled down. The mail matter will be an entire loss, and no doubt must be quite heavy, as on Friday a large number of registered letters pass over this line. We noticed a sad incident in this connection, viz: a family from the west were on their way to some part of the state of New York in charge of the body of their daughter, whither they were removing it for interment. The corpse having been disinterred after burial of several months, it was fastened to the platform between the baggage and express cars, as decomposition had taken place. Of course it was almost consumed, and while the grief stricken father collected together the charred and blackened remnants, he was not by any means choice in his maledictions upon the careless engineer. The only injuries to persons in the accident to speak of, were sustained by the fireman on the passenger train, who received some pretty severe scalp wounds in jumping from the engine at the time of the collision. Those in the postal car escaped with slight bruises in the general shaking up. It is a noticeable fact that the Lake Shore company possess a happy faculty of setting things in order on short notice, for passengers were delayed but a few hours, the wreck having been removed and the track made clear by 6 00 P. M., when all trains passed over as smooth as skating on virgin ice to silver music. At the present writing there is nothing left to tell the tale of the late unpleasantness. Conductor O. B. Clark, in charge of No. 4, said that some evil genius seemed to shadow him in this vicinity. Nearly ten years ago he struck a broken rail one mile west of town, by which three coaches were ditched and many passengers hurt, but as in the latter case no lives were lost.

On last Tuesday morning our townspeople awoke from their slumbers to find a black flag floating at half-mast from the democratic pole. If, in the height of their glee over a stolen President, some of the radical enthusiastic idiots, not a thousand miles from Corunna, imagine that by the 'job' of Monday night the democrats have been 'scooped,' they should reflect that their thievery done it. It has got so now, that [illegible] to. Such acts as these will only serve to unite the democracy more firmly together against the party of thievery and oppression.

B. C. Chaffee, "Uncle Ben," is fitting up the south room in his building preparatory to moving the post office therein. In the event that matters at Washington continue to run 'cross-grained,' who the duce will assume the responsible position of P. M.? That's what mystifies no less than twenty of our anxious republican brethren. Seriously, we would advise His Fraudulency to retain 'Uncle Ben,' as he has made a faithful and efficient officer.

Wheat has taken an upward bounce, but the receipts have been light since our last report owing to the condition of the roads. On Tuesday and Wednesday the prices offered averaged as follows: Amber No. one, $1.40; No. two, do. $1.30. Oats and corn are dull at 38c for the former, and 50c for the latter. Clover seed, $8.90; eggs, 10c; butter, 15c; hogs, live weight, 4c@5c; dressed, 6c@6½c; hides, green, 5c.

Truly, the telegraph is a great institution. In a short time after the railroad accident, the Company had improvised an office at the point of the wreck, and were putting the wires in requisition, with Track Master Keniff at the instrument.

Mr. Samuel Link whose illness was mentioned last week died on last Friday morning. The old gentlemen has been quite feeble for a long time and his demise was no unexpected. He leaves a large family to mourn his loss.

If the marshal of Auburn wants to put a feather in his cap let him come down here once in a while and gather in a few "Monte Sharps" and "Bank steerers." The harvest is ripe most any time.

It was the WORK who stole the chickens. The WORK is well known to the citizens of this community though not by that name. He has no visible means of support and it is a wonder that the citizens have not dropped on him before this. We are of the opinion that he like the purloiner of fuel had better betake himself to fresh fields and pastures new.

The amature detectives were all tore up about a supposed murderer who was loafing around the depot for a day or two last week, Alphonso gave him the "collar" and the rest of the gang stood guard over him with drawn "weapons" for several hours. They finally jugged the poor devil and sent for the sheriff of Marshall county who arrived on time only to be disappointed for it was not his man. The intentions of the "amatures" was good however and we wish them better luck next time.

LATER.—Since writing the above the sheriff of Miami county has put in an appearance and claimed the victory his' own—all's well that ends well.

There is always something turns up to releive the monotony of the daily routine of life at the junction. This time it was a rusty looking old "bum" in a summer overcoat and blue overalls. He claimed to be a rail road engineer, had been in every battle in the late unpleasantness, was the first engineer on the U. P. R. R. Was intimately acquainted with all the noted personages of the time's, and he longed to an aristocratic family in New Yawk himself. The boys filled him up with "Tosil oil" and took it all in till he got to California when he said his uncle owned a dairy and milks 20,000 cows. At this they began to drop out one by one saying that they thought the house would fall down on that man and they didn't want to be around when it happened. The boys have got a spite at Garrett city so they took up a collection and shipped him down there to talk some of the inhabitants to death.

Now as our public school has closed, can we not have a Sunday School organized? This is certainly a hopeful point for the labors of some influential sabbath school worker.

The literary society, at McClellan's school house came to a focus last Saturday evening. We are sorry, as their meetings were always interesting, and we enjoyed ourself when there.

On last Friday evening a topsy specimen of degraded humanity was seen in the western suburbs of our village, whither he had been directed to find a hotel. Wonder if squirt-gun No. 2 obtained his last chew of tobacco for that information.

We never thought a donkey was much of a kicker until by some unlucky step we came in reach of his heels a short time ago, when he took us a kerspat, and for the first time in our life we must confess we have been kicked by a J—A—(alias Alphonso.) But we consider.

"In our time we've endured many a bore,
And expect to many more."

Miss Hornberger has been selected to teach the spring term of our school. She comes well recommended and there need be nothing in the way of her complete success, unless it be placed there by unscrupulous designers. There is a certain class of persons who consider it a matter of course, that teachers and pupils are natural borne enemies, instead of mutual friends, and they suppose the only compromise to be brute force. Persons holding such views, by diffusing their peculiar influence about those interested, aid very materially in producing annoyance. There are others who delight to boast of the bad qualities of a school, while they let the commendable points rest. But we are happy to say that those classes are sadly in the minority among us; consisting chiefly of a few ignoramuses and designing scape graces, who have no interest in the community outside of their own narrow-minded plottings.

It is quite evident, from his last voluminous discharge in the "Republican" a few weeks ago, that Alphonso had resorted to the prescription recommended to him; still there is a peculiar strain plainly manifested which betokens such great labor, that we would advise him to increase the dose, then we may have great hopes of the patients recovery.

He says he will make us think he is a steam engine, etc. Laws, you! That is just the impression we got the first time we saw your camel-back, but we have been convinced since, that the power is only sufficient to run a very small gun. He says further, that Don Pedro No. 1 and 2 have not the "scents" pertaining to skunks. We are sorry for the sake of his associates that we can not pay him the same compliment. But leaving all jokes aside, if there is another person in DeKalb county who can beat Osgood for silly softness, he should be contrabanded immediately before he spoils

Father Langcake was preaching a sermon, and had been speaking about ten minutes when a woman went into a hysteric fit in the gallery. At this juncture the cry of fire was heard, and a rush was made for the exit from the gallery. The doorway was blocked for a moment by a very large woman, and this check caused the panic to increase tenfold. The crowd hurled the woman down the steps. The distinguished party were immediately ushered into the council chamber, where the Cabinet was in session, and all the proceedings stopped, so that courtesies and formalities of introduction might proceed. The President-elect was cordially greeted and congratulated by President Grant and members of the Cabinet, all of whom, with the exception of Secretary Morrill, who was kept away by sickness, were present, and mutual expressions of happiness were exchanged at the termination of the questions that have agitated Congress and the country. From the Executive Mansion the party drove to the Capitol, proceeding at once, by invitation of the President of the Senate, to the Vice President's room, where an informal reception was held. All the Republican and many Democratic Senators and Representatives called [illegible] President Grant, on the 3d inst., issued his proclamation convening in extra session the Senate of the United States, to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive.

PRESIDENT HAYES resigned the office of Governor of Ohio on the 2d inst., and Lieut. Gov. Thomas L. Young on that day was formally sworn in as his successor.

AT a caucus of the Democratic members of the House, at Washington, on the 3d inst., a violent scene was enacted, wherein Beverly Douglass, of Virginia, and L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, were the participants. Douglas made an attack upon Lamar, who was Chairman of the caucus, abusing him without stint, and charging him with treachery to his party. He said Lamar had sold out to the Republicans to secure his admission to the Senate, and denounced him in opprobrious and offensive terms. This was several times repeated, Lamar each time requesting the friends of Douglas to remove him, as the old man was scarcely responsible for what he said, but, after being removed, Douglas each time returned, threatening attack, and finally Lamar, stung to anger by these extraordinary provocations, drew a small pocket-pistol in the caucus and told Douglas' friends if he (Douglas) was not removed he certainly would be killed. Thereupon Douglas' friends were quick to to take Douglas forcibly away.... Senator Barnum, of Connecticut, has been elected Chairman of the National Democratic Committee, vice Abram S. Hewitt, resigned.

ABRAM S. HEWITT, in resigning the Chairmanship of the National Democratic Committee, writes a letter of considerable length, in which he defends his action upon the Electoral bill. Regarding his assent to the completion of the count, he says that as an honorable man no other course was open to him, but, if honor had permitted otherwise, his judgment was that it was the wisest course for the country, as well as for the Democratic party, to proceed in accordance with the law to an orderly completion of the count, although they knew it would result in the installation of Hayes. He recites as his opinion that disastrous consequences would have resulted in the defeat of the count, resulting eventually in civil war, and to him appeared on one side anarchy and civil war, and on the other peace and order. ...Representative Douglas publishes a card in the Washington papers admitting he did injustice to Representative Lamar, to the Democratic caucus, in rudely addressing him, and expressing his high appreciation of the character of that gentleman..... The Finance Committee of the San Francisco Board of Supervisors, after a lengthy and searching investigation into the alleged frauds at the November election in that city, report that a total of at least 8,160 fraudulent votes were cast. They claim that the Registration law, instead of a check, is an absolute assistance to fraud in elections.

HENRY M. MATHEWS, the successor of Mr. Jacobs as Governor of West Virginia, was inducted into office last week.

DURING the debate in the United States Senate, on the 7th inst., Mr. Blaine read the following telegram:

> COLUMBIA, S. C., March 6, 1877.
> To Hon. D. T. Corbin:
> I have just had a long interview with Haskell, who brings letters to me from Stanley Matthews and Mr. Evarts. The purport of Matthews' letter is that I ought to yield my rights for the good of the country. This is embarrassing beyond endurance. If such action is desired I want to know it authoritatively. I am not acting for myself, and I cannot assume such responsibility. Please inquire and telegraph me to-night.
> (Signed) D. H. CHAMBERLAIN.

A Chicago Tribune special of the 8th says in reference to this telegram: "President Hayes says that Stanley Matthews had no authority to give the letter to Haskell, Chairman of the Democratic State Committee in South Carolina, to which Chamberlain referred in the dispatch which Blaine received to-day. Gov. Hayes had no knowledge of the letter, and did not authorize it."

IN the Senate, on the 8th inst., Mr. Blaine sent to the Clerk's desk the following letter in reference to the telegram read by him on the 6th, and had it read:

> WASHINGTON, March 8.
> To the Hon. J. G. Blaine:
> DEAR SIR: The Hon. Wm. M. Evarts begs me to say to you that he did not indorse the letter of Stanley Matthews to Gov. Chamberlain to the extent implied by the telegram of Gov. Chamberlain to me; that the letter was presented to him by Haskell, of South Carolina, and he wrote upon it substantially as follows: That he had read the foregoing letter; that he desired to see the troubles in South Carolina composed; he desired to hear from Gov. Chamberlain upon the subject. Very respectfully,
> D. T. CORBIN.

Also the following telegram, received by him to-day:

> NEW ORLEANS, March 7.
> To the Hon. J. G. Blaine:
> Senator Bayard is mistaken. In every parish outside of the city, except the five bulldozed parishes, in one of which our Tax Collector has just been murdered, my Government is recognized by all save a few pretended Nicholls officials.

CONGRESS.

FRIDAY, March 2.—SENATE.—A resolution was adopted authorizing the appointment of a committee to make the necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the incoming President, and Messrs. Merrimon, Howe and McCreery were appointed on the committee.....A petition was received from Gen. Abe Buford, the well-known Kentucky turfman, for the removal of his political disabilities.... The credentials of T. F. Grover, Senator-elect from Oregon, were presented and referred....Mr. Howe, from the sub-Committee on Privileges and Elections, which made an investigation in regard to the Louisiana election, submitted a portion of the report of the committee, now finished, and moved that it be printed. So ordered. Mr. Saulsbury was granted permission to file and have printed the views of the minority of the committee....Mr. Jones, of Nevada, from the special committee appointed in August last to inquire into the change which has taken place in the relative value of gold and silver, the causes thereof, etc., commonly known as the Silver Commission, submitted the report of the commission. Mr. Boutwell, a member of the commission, sub[illegible] Prof. Bowen, one of the experts appointed by the commission. Both reports were ordered printed....House bill granting to the State of Missouri all the lands therein selected as swamp and overflowed lands was passed....The concurrent resolution of the House to print 300,000 copies of the Agricultural Report for 1876 was agreed to....The Sundry Civil Appropriation bill was passed.

HOUSE.—Mr. Hurd offered a preamble and resolution, reciting that it had been decided that a President of the United States may be inaugurated on the fraudulent action of the Louisiana Returning Board, and that the men who have so contributed to the election of the Chief Magistrate of the Union ought no longer to be in confinement, and directing that the members of the Louisiana Returning Board be discharged from custody. The resolution was rejected—yeas, 89; nays, 97......Mr. Field, from the select committee on privileges, reported a bill to provide an effectual remedy for wrongful intrusion into the office of President and Vice President. It provides that when any person intrudes into, or without due election holds or exercises the office of President or Vice President of the United States, his title to the office, and the title of any claimant thereto, may be tried by an action in the nature of quo warranto. The court shall inquire whether the electoral votes were cast by the persons duly appointed in the manner directed by the State Legislatures, and shall receive evidence tending to show forgery, falsehood, or the invalidity of any certificates of any Governor, canvasser, or other officer. The court is to reject the votes of all persons ineligible at the time of their alleged appointment, or incapacitated at the time of casting their votes, and the court must investigate any other fact necessary to a judgment of the rights of the parties, the judgment to be rendered within ten days after the verdict of the jury. If the defendant be adjudged not entitled to the office, he shall be excluded from it, and if the claimant be adjudged entitled to it he shall immediately enter on the duties of the office. Appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. After debate Mr. Field called for the previous question on the passage of the bill, and it was defeated—yeas, 86; nays, 99....Mr. Cox moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill removing all political disabilities imposed and remaining on any person under the Fourteenth amendment to the constitution. Agreed to—148 to 37....The Army Appropriation bill was passed.

SATURDAY, March 3.—Work on the appropriation bills was pushed along with great rapidity in both houses, and all the bills were completed and passed before midnight. The Senate refused to concur in the House amendment to the Legislative Appropriation bill cutting down the President's salary to $25,000 a year, and the bill as passed fixes the salary at $50,000. There was such a serious hitch on the Army and River and Harbor bills that neither of them go through. Five conferences were had on the Army bill during the day's session. The House insisted that the army should be reduced to 20,000, and that the section of the bill prohibiting the use of troops in sustaining State Governments should remain. The Senate as strenuously opposed the two items. Both were unyielding, and thus the measure failed. The appropriation of last year leaves sufficient to support the army until the end of the present fiscal year, so that no extra session is likely to be immediately called. The River and Harbor bill was reported from the Committee of Commerce, but was not considered. There is, however, a large surplus of money from last year's appropriation, and therefore no improvement actually needed will suffer by the non-passage of the bill. The customary resolutions of thanks to the presiding officers were passed in the Senate and House, the customary responses made, and at 12 o'clock m. of Sunday, March 4, both houses of the Forty-fourth Congress adjourned sine die. The proceedings in the two houses, exclusive of the work on the Appropriation bills, is summarized below:

SENATE.—the notable feature of the Senate proceedings was the defeat of the Equalization Bounty bill. Mr. Logan earnestly advocated it, calling upon the Senate to be just to the soldiers, and said the cost of the bill would not exceed $3,000,000. Mr. Sargent, in opposition, claimed that it would require $100,000,000. The bill was indefinitely postponed by a vote of 31 to 23.... The bill recently reported by the Finance Committee, in accordance with the recommendations of President Grant, to aid in the resumption of specie payments, was postponed until the first Wednesday in December next, by a vote of 27 to 22.... The bill making appropriations for the payment of claims allowed by the Southern Claims Commission was passed.

HOUSE.—In the House the famous Choctaw scheme was killed, the bill authorizing the nation to bring suit in the Court of Claims failing to get the necessary two-thirds.....The bill to extend the Southern Claims Commission for two years passed the House, and thus became a law....A resolution was adopted ordering the discharge from custody of the members of the Louisiana Returning Board... A resolution was reported from the select committee on privileges, declaring that Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks received 196 votes of the electors legally and constitutionally appointed, and were thereby duly elected President and Vice President of the United States. Mr. White, of Kentucky, denounced the resolution as "revolutionary, treasonable and damnable." It was passed by a strict party vote—137 to 88....Mr. Field, from the select committee on privileges, reported a resolution declaring (after a long preamble) that in counting the electoral vote of any State it is the right and duty of Congress and of the House to inquire whether any votes purporting to come from a State have been cast by persons duly appointed by that State, and for that purpose to receive evidence of forgery, falsehood, or invalidity of any certificate of any Governor or canvasser. Adopted without the yeas and nays....Mr. Sayler's amendment to the rules giving the Clerk of the House (pending the election of Speaker) authority to require the Sergeant-at-Arms to aid in enforcing order was discussed and passed. The measure was resisted by the Republicans.

Extra Session of the Senate.

MONDAY, March 5.—The Senate was called to order by Secretary Gorham, and Dr. Sunderland then offered prayer....After prayer, the proclamation of the President calling the Senate into executive session was read....Mr. Hamlin offered a resolution which he said was customarily offered on such an occasion. The resolution provided that Senator Howe should administer the oath of office to Mr. Ferry, who is hereby elected President pro tem. of the Senate. Adopted unanimously. The oath was then administered to Mr. Ferry by Senator Howe. Mr. Ferry then took the chair and returned his sincere thanks to the Senat for the honor conferred upon him, and directed the Secretary to call the roll of newly-elected Senators, who, as soon as their names were called, took the oath. Four were sworn at a time, the first four being Messrs. Anthony, Blaine, Beck and Hoar. The second four called were Messrs. Kirkwood, Grover of Oregon, Davis of West Virginia, and Davis of Illinois. All responded but Grover, and McPherson, New Jersey, was called in his place. The third list called embraced Messrs. Plumb of Kansas, Rollins of New Hampshire, Saulsbury, Saunders of Nebraska, Teller of Colorado, and Windom. The fourth list embraced Messrs. Coke, Garland, Hill of Georgia, Johnson and Ransom. All these took the modified oath. Senator Kellogg was then called and was about to take the oath when Mr. Bogy objected....A resolution was adopted that all contested credentials be temporarily laid upon the table....Mr. Ferry announced two sets of credentials from South Carolina....Mr. Spencer objected to the credentials of the Senators-elect from Mississippi and Alabama, and they were laid on the table.....The oath of office was administered to Vice President Wheeler. Mr. Wheeler made a brief address, in which he said he was about to enter upon the duties of his office, and that as President of the Senate he would endeavor to lift himself above partisanship and to so preside as to facilitate and expedite the deliberations of the Senate.

TUESDAY, March 6.—Mr. Wallace submitted a resolution that the credentials of L. Q. C. Lamar, Senator-elect from Mississippi, be taken from the table and he be sworn. Mr. Morton and Mr. Spencer opposed the seating of Mr. Lamar, on the ground that the Legislature that elected him was a fraud. Mr. Blaine said that Lamar's credentials were entirely regular, and he was just as much entitled to be sworn in as he (Blaine) or any other Senator. After further discussion, the resolution of Mr. Wallace was agreed to—yeas, 41; nays, 1.... Mr. Blaine then moved that the oath of office be administered to William Pitt Kellogg as Senator from Louisiana, and spoke at length in favor of his motion. Before reaching a vote the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 7.—SENATE.—Immediately after the reading of the journal, Mr. Wallace moved that the Senator-elect from Oregon, Lafayette Grover, be sworn. Mr. Hamlin objected, and his case was laid over....The case of William Pitt Kellogg then came up on the substitute of Mr. Bayard to Mr. Blaine's resolution that he be sworn. The substitute provides that his case lie on the table until the appointment of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and its reference to that committee. After a long discussion, participated in by Messrs. Bayard, Blaine, Morton and others, Mr. Bayard's substitute was adopted, by a vote of 36 to 28—Messrs. Booth, Burnside, Christiancy, Conkling, Morrill and some others voting with the Democrats.... Mr. Patterson submitted a resolution that the credentials of David T. Corbin and M. C. Butler, each claiming the seat as Senator from South Carolina, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Agreed to....The Senate then went into executive session, during which the President sent in his Cabinet appointments, which were laid over until the appointment of the standing committees. ....The doors were then opened, and the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 8.—SENATE.—On the meeting of the Senate, the credentials of John T. Morgan as Senator from Alabama, were taken from the table, and he was sworn....After considerable discussion, in which Messrs. Conkling, Morton, Thurman, McMillan and Saulsbury took part, Mr. Sargent's substitute to the resolution seating Lafayette Grover as Senator from Oregon was adopted, and he was sworn....Mr. Thurman said at a former session of the Senate the credentials of J. Eustis, claiming to be a Senator from Louisiana, were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The committee reported against the right of Eustis to a seat, on the ground that the vacancy had been filled by the election of Pinchback. Subsequently the Senate decided that Pinchback was not elected. He therefore submitted a resolution that the credentials of Eustis be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Laid over....The Senate then went into executive session, and, when the doors reopened, adjourned.

FINIS.

Closing Scene of the Electoral Count.

The final proceedings in the electoral count at Washington are given below:

The Senate and House, being in joint convention, at 4:08 o'clock on the morning of Friday, March 2, the action of the respective houses on the Wisconsin question was read, and the ten votes of Wisconsin were announced for Hayes and Wheeler.

The presiding officer said: "This concludes the count of the thirty-eight States of the Union. The tellers will now ascertain and deliver the result of the votes to the presiding officer."

Senator Allison, one of the tellers, having delivered the statement, the presiding officer expressed the hope that on the announcement nothing would mar the dignity of the proceedings so reputable to the American people and so worthy of the respect of the world.

He then said: "The whole number of electors appointed to vote for President and Vice President of the United States was 369, of which a majority is 185. The state of vote for President, as delivered by tellers and as determined under act of Congress of Jan. 29, 1877, on this subject, is: For Rutherford B. Hayes, 185 votes; for Samuel J. Tilden, 184 votes. The state of the vote for Vice President of the United States, as delivered by tellers and as determined under act of Congress approved Jan. 29, 1877, on this subject, is: For William A. Wheeler, 185 votes; for Thomas A. Hendricks, 184 votes. Wherefore, I do announce that Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1877. That Wm. A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected Vice President of the United States, for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1877.

"This announcement, together with the list of votes, will be entered on the journals of both houses.

"The count of the electoral votes being completed, and the result determined, the joint meeting of the two houses is dissolved. The Senate will now retire to its chamber."

Suicides in New York.

There have been an unusual number of suicides here this winter, and some of the victims were very young. The hard times have had a terribly depressing effect on many people, domestic difficulties have excited more, and dissipation has demoralized not a few. It seems that over 400 people commit suicide here by drowning every year. Very few of their names appear in the papers. A man is missed; inquiries are made among his friends; a notice is published; the morgue is visited; the excitement subsides; when a portion of his body is possibly found, nobody identifies it. Last fall, a young man who was out of business and completely discouraged went away. His family expected to hear from him at Chicago or Baltimore. No word came. Last week, a piece of a coat, with a pocket-piece that sister and mother recognized instantly as his, was picked up and accidentally shown them. He had passed through the deep, deep water to another sea. Life here, with all its excitements and fascinations, has a very broad, black border.—New York Letter.

Hill and Yancey.

The bitter Senatorial contest in Georgia has resulted in a revival of the story of the encounter between Hill and Yancey, the fire-eater, in a secret session of the Confederate Senate. During a heated debate Hill called Yancey a liar, whereupon the latter sprang forward to strike Hill, who caught him and threw him violently over a desk. In the fall his spine was injured, and he lay unconscious on the floor, with the blood oozing from his lips. He was taken away, and the members tried to keep the matter secret, and did prevent it from being known for six months. Yancey never recovered; he drooped from day to day, became hopeless, listless and vacant, and finally died.

This is the way Watterson announced it a week ago last Saturday morning: "The first of my 10,000 Kentuckians has already arrived at the capital. He is in arms, too—and he weighs eleven pounds."

WOMAN'S LOVE.

As all the trees fill out with bloom,
With leaf as green and blossom sweet,
As they destroy dark winter's gloom;
With beauty for our spirits meet,
So dawns the time when spring shall rise
To man, in selfish winter cast,
When woman's love, with glad surprise,
Shall grow like these before his eyes,
And all repining then be past,
And summer crown our lives at last.

Uncle Tom.

"Uncle Tom," of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," is still alive and hearty. At least the Rev. Joseph Henson, who claims to be the original of the famous character in Mrs. Stowe's novel, has been for some time in England, where he has received much attention. He puts his age at 88 years. A farewell meeting in his honor was lately held in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, at which Lord Shaftesbury presided. The English people have given "Uncle Tom" the sum of £1,300.

WASHINGTON, March 5.

A very brilliant audience assembled in the Senate Chamber as early as 10 o'clock to witness the inaugural ceremonies, the majority being ladies. The diplomatic gallery was entirely filled with members of the diplomatic corps and [illegible].

At 5 minutes before 12 o'clock the foreign Ministers, dressed in full court dress, entered the chamber, creating something like a sensation. They took seats on the right side of the chamber. Following the diplomatic corps came the members of the Supreme Court, headed by Chief Justice Waite, who were assigned seats on the right in front of the foreign ministers. Judge Davis was among them, but Justices Clifford and Field were absent. Judge Davis did not wear the customary robe of black. Precisely at 12 o'clock the President entered the chamber. He walked up the main aisle by the side of ex-President Grant, and took a seat in the space immediately in front of the Secretary's desk.

The members of the Cabinet, preceded by Secretary Fish, followed, and were assigned seats on the left of the President.

The appearance of President Hayes was the signal for loud clapping of hands by the occupants of the galleries.

The space on the eastern front of the Capitol, where President Hayes delivered his inaugural address, was completely packed with people, who were loud in their cheers during the time the President was speaking. A great many thousand people were present—exactly how many cannot be easily estimated. A space of ground of about 1,000 feet by 800 wide was completely packed with people.

At 1:10 the ceremonies were concluded, and the procession started on its return to escort President Hayes to the White House.

The following is the inaugural address of President Hayes in full:

FELLOW-CITIZENS: We have assembled to repeat the public ceremonial begun by Washington, observed by all my predecessors, and now a time-honored custom, which marks the commencement of a new term in the Presidential office. Called to the duties of this great trust, I proceed, in compliance with usage, to announce some of the leading principles, on the subjects that now chiefly engage public attention, by which it is my desire to be guided in the discharge of those duties. I shall not undertake to lay down irrevocably principles or measures of administration, but rather to speak of the motives which should animate us, and to suggest certain important ends to be attained in accordance with our institutions and essential to the welfare of our country. At the outset of the discussions which preceded the recent Presidential election, it seemed to me fitting that I should fully make known my sentiments in regard to several of the important questions which then appeared to demand the consideration of the country. Following the example, and in part adopting the language of one of my predecessors, I wish now, when every motive for misrepresentation has passed away, to repeat what was said before the election, trusting that my countrymen will candidly weigh and understand it, and they will feel assured that the sentiments declared in accepting my nomination for the Presidency will be the standard of my conduct in the path before me. Charged as I now am with the grave and difficult task of carrying them out in the practical administration of the Government, so far as depends under the constitution and laws on the Chief Executive of the nation, the permanent pacification of the country, upon such principles and by such measures as will secure the complete protection of all its citizens in the free enjoyment of all their constitutional rights, is now the one subject in our public affairs which all thoughtful and patriotic citizens regard as of supreme importance.

Many of the calamitous effects of the tremendous revolution which has passed over the Southern States still remain. The immeasurable benefits which will surely follow, sooner or later, the hearty and generous acceptance of the legitimate results of that revolution have not yet been realized. Difficult and embarrassing questions meet us at the threshold of this subject. The people of those States are still impoverished, and the inestimable blessing of wise, honest and peaceful local self-government is not fully enjoyed. Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the cause of this condition of things, the fact is clear that in the progress of events the time has come when such government is an imperative necessity, required by all the varied interests, public and private, of those States; but it must not be forgotten that only a local government which recognizes and maintains inviolate the rights of all is a true self-government.

With respect to the two distinct races whose peculiar relations to each other have brought upon us deplorable complications and perplexities which exist in those States; it must be a government which guards the interests of both races carefully and equally; it must be a government which submits loyally and heartily to the constitution and laws—the laws of the nation and the laws of the States themselves—accepting and obeying faithfully the whole constitution as it is.

Resting upon this sure and substantial foundation, that superstructure of beneficent local governments can be built up, and not otherwise. In furtherance of such obedience to the letter and spirit of the constitution, and in behalf of all that its attainment implies, all so-called party interests lose their apparent importance, and party lines may well be permitted to fall into insignificance.

The question we have to consider for the immediate welfare of those States of the Union is the question of government, or no government—of social order and all the peaceful industries and the happiness that belongs to it, or a return to barbarism. It is a question in which every citizen of the nation is deeply interested, and with respect to which we ought not to be in a partisan sense either Republicans or Democrats, but fellow-citizens and fellow-men, to whom the interests of a common country and a common humanity are dear.

The sweeping revolution of the entire labor system of a large portion of our country, and the advance of 4,000,000 people from a condition of servitude to that of citizenship, upon an equal footing with their former masters, could not occur without presenting problems of the gravest moment, to be dealt with by the emancipated race, by their former masters, and by the General Government, the author of the act of emancipation. That it was a wise, just and providential act, fraught with good for all concerned, is now generally conceded throughout the country. That a moral obligation rests upon the National Government to employ its constitutional power and influence to establish the rights of the people whom it has emancipated, and to protect them in the enjoyment of those rights when they are infringed on or assailed, is also generally admitted.

The evils which afflict the Southern States can only be removed or remedied by the united and harmonious efforts of both races, actuated by motives of mutual sympathy and regard, and, while in duty bound and fully determined to protect the rights of all by every constitutional means at the disposal of my administration, I am sincerely anxious to use every legitimate influence in favor of honest and efficient local government, as the true resource of those States for the promotion of the contentment and prosperity of their citizens. In the effort I shall make to accomplish this purpose, I ask the cordial co-operation of all who cherish an interest in the welfare of the country, trusting that party ties and prejudice of race will be freely surrendered in behalf of the great purpose to be accomplished in the important work of the restoration of the South. It is not the political situation alone that merits attention. The material development of that section of the country has been arrested by the social and political revolution through which it has passed, and now needs and deserves the considerate care of the National Government within the just limits prescribed by the constitution and wise public economy. But at the basis of all prosperity, for that as well as for every other part of the country, lies the improvement of the intellectual and moral condition of the people. Universal suffrage should rest upon universal education. To this end a liberal and permanent provision should be made for the support of free schools by State Governments, and, if need be, supplemented by legitimate aid from the national authority.

Let me assure my countrymen of the Southern States that it is my earnest desire to regard and promote their truest interests—the interests of the white and of the colored people, both and equally—and put forth my best efforts in behalf of a civil policy which will forever wipe out in our political affairs the color line and the distinction between the North and South, to the end that we may have not merely a united North or a united South, but a united country.

I ask the attention of the public to the paramount necessity of reform in our civil service, a reform not merely as to certain abuses and practices of so-called official patronage, which have come to have the sanction of usage in the several departments of our Government, but a change of the system of appointment itself—a reform that shall be thorough, radical and complete—a return to the principles and practices of the founders of the Government. They neither expected nor desired from public officers any partisan service; they meant that public officers should owe their whole service to the Government and to the people; they meant that the officer should be secure in his tenure as long as his personal character remained untarnished and the performance of his duties was satisfactory. They held that appointments to office were not to be made or expected merely as rewards for partisan services, nor merely on the nomination of members of Congress, as being entitled in any respect to the control of such appointments. The fact that both political parties of the country, in declaring their principles prior to the election, gave a prominent place to the subject of the reform of our civil service, recognizing and strongly urging its necessity in terms almost identical in their specific import with those I have here employed, must be accepted as a conclusive argument in behalf of these measures. It must be regarded as the expression of the united voice and will of the whole country upon this subject, and both political parties are virtually pledged to give it their unreserved support.

The President of the United States, of necessity, owes his election to office to the suffrages and zealous labors of a political party, the members of which cherish with ardor, and regard as of essential importance, the principles of their party organization. But he should strive to be always mindful of the fact that he serves his party best who serves the country best.

In furtherance of the reform we seek, and in other important respects, a change of great importance, I recommend an amendment to the constitution, prescribing a term of six years for the Presidential office, and forbidding a re-election.

With respect to the financial condition of the country, I shall not attempt an extended history of the embarrassment and prostration which we have suffered during the past three years. The depression in all our varied commercial and manufacturing interests throughout the country, which began in September, 1873, still continues. It is very gratifying, however, to be able to say that there are indications all around us of a coming change and prosperous times.

Upon the currency question, intimately connected as it is with this topic, I may be permitted to repeat the statement made in my letter of acceptance, that in my judgment the feeling of uncertainty inseparable from an irredeemable paper currency, with its fluctuations of values, is one of the greatest obstacles of a return to prosperous times. The only safe paper currency is one which rests upon a coin basis, and is at all times promptly converted into coin.

I adhere to the views heretofore expressed by me in favor of Congressional legislation in behalf of an early resumption of specie payment, and I am satisfied not only that this is wise, but that the interests, as well as the public sentiment, of the country imperatively demand it.

Passing from these remarks upon the condition of our own country to consider our relations with other lands, we are reminded by international complications abroad, threatening the peace of Europe, that our traditional rule of non-interference in affairs of foreign nations has proved of great value in past times, and ought to be strictly observed.

The policy inaugurated by my honored predecessor—Gen. Grant—of submitting to arbitration grave questions in dispute between ourselves and foreign powers points to a new and incomparably best instrumentality for the preservation of peace, and will, as I believe, become a beneficent example of the course to be pursued in similar emergencies by other nations.

If, unhappily, questions of difference should at any time, during the period of my administration, arise between the United States and any foreign Government, it will certainly be my disposition and my hope to aid in their settlement in the same peaceful and honorable way, thus securing to our country the great blessings of peace and mutual good offices with all nations of the world.

Fellow-citizens, we have reached the close of a political contest marked with the excitement which usually attends the contests between great political parties whose members espouse and advocate with earnest faith their respective creeds. The circumstances were, perhaps, in no respect extraordinary save in the closeness and the consequent uncertainty of the result.

For the first time in the history of the country it has been deemed best, in view of the peculiar circumstances of the case, that the objections and questions in dispute with reference to the counting of the electoral votes should be referred to the decision of a tribunal appointed for this purpose. That tribunal, established by law for this sole purpose, its members, all of them, of long-established reputation for integrity and intelligence, and, with the exception of those who are also members of the Supreme Judiciary, chosen equally from both political parties, its deliberations enlightened by the research and the arguments of able counsel, was entitled to the fullest confidence of the American people. Its decisions have been patiently waited for and accepted as legally conclusive by the general judgment of the public. For the present, opinion will widely vary as to the wisdom of the several conclusions announced by that tribunal. This is to be anticipated in every instance where matters of dispute are made the subject of arbitration under the forms of law. Human judgment is never unerring, and is rarely regarded as otherwise than wrong by the unsuccessful party in the contest. The fact that two great political parties have in this way settled a dispute in regard to which good men differ as to the law, no less than as to the proper course to be pursued in solving questions in controversy, is an occasion for general rejoicing. Upon one point there is entire unanimity in public sentiment—that conflicting claims to the Presidency must be amicably and peaceably adjusted, and that when so adjusted the general acquiescence of the nation ought surely to follow.

It has been reserved for a government of the people, where the right of suffrage is universal, to give to the world the first example in history of a great nation, in the midst of a struggle of opposing parties for power, hushing its party tumults to yield the issue of the contest to adjustment according to the forms of law.

Looking for the guidance of that divine hand by which the destinies of nations and individuals are shaped, I call upon you, Senators, Representatives, Judges, fellow-citizens, here and everywhere, to unite with me in an earnest effort to secure to our country the blessing, not only of material prosperity, but of justice, peace and union—a union depending not upon the constraints of force, but upon the loving devotion of a free people—so that all things may be so ordered and settled upon the best and surest foundation, that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety, may be established among us for all generations.

A VIRGINIA hunter says he saw about 700,000 ducks settle on a pond. They were wedged closely together. He fired both barrels of his gun into them. They flew away, leaving no dead ones in the water; but, as soon as the flock spread out a little, dead ducks loosened and fell until he picked up enough to fill twenty-nine barrels.

LIVELY TIMES.

Boisterous Debate in the House of Representatives on the Vermont Case.

A resolution was offered by Mr. Poppleton that the House would refuse to proceed further with the electoral count unless the Senate produced the Aldrich certificate from Vermont, alleged to be in the hands of Vice President Ferry.

Mr. Wood maintained that the resolution was out of order. Mr. Caulfield agreed that nothing was in order but to proceed to the consideration of the objections, unless there was an impediment in the way of such consideration. Such an impediment had arisen. The gentleman from Illinois (Springer) had yesterday offered an objection which had been accompanied by a certificate, and the presiding officer had refused to open this certificate. A resolution which had been offered to-day asked that the Senate be notified that the House would be ready to receive that body in joint session for the purpose of opening that certificate.

Mr. Hendee, of Vermont, called attention to the fact that the Clerk of the Court, to whom the second certificate was delivered, was a Democrat.

Mr. Hooker argued against the point of order, stating that the real question was whether the certificates from Vermont were single or dual in their character; if they were dual, the point of order did not apply, and it was the duty of the President of the Senate to open and submit the package presented to him yesterday.

Mr. Reagan supported the point of order, and argued against the resolution, as proposing a new question which had not been presented to the joint meeting of the two houses. He expressed his great regret that where his side of the House had good, and valid, and substantial objections to the electoral count, any other objections which could not command the respect of the party or of the country had been made.

After some further discussion, the Speaker said: "With my best respect for all parties concerned, the Chair considers that a great mistake and wrong was committed yesterday in the joint session of the two houses, in this, that the presiding officer refused to receive, even for opening, reading and information, a package which had all the surroundings of an authentic paper in respect to an electoral vote of the State of Vermont. The Chair does not think that in any aspect of this case he would be called upon to rule that the action of the presiding officer of the joint convention yesterday was wrong. He does not think he possesses the power, nor does he believe, in a technical sense, that the action of the joint convention can be reviewed in this House in the manner proposed, and yet there is, above all, a fact on which this matter rests. The fact is, whether this House should have possession of this paper. To that extent, and to that extent only, the Chair thinks that the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois (Caulfield) is in order.

While the Speaker was delivering this opinion, there was a subsidence of the uproar, which had been increasing little by little during the day, but as soon as he had got through the noise and confusion began to prevail again, and in a short time the storm had increased to a gale. The central point of it was the question whether before the two hours' discussion commenced the President of the Senate should be called upon to send back to the House the packages produced yesterday by Mr. Hewitt and submitted with Mr. Springer's objections to the count. The Speaker did all that was in his power to get the House into the regular channel of business, and he refused to entertain an appeal from his ruling. His resoluteness lashed the opposing elements into a fury. Springer, O'Brien, Caulfield, Sparks, and Poppleton, were all addressing the Speaker at once, and worrying him and the House with all sorts of questions and objections. They were suddenly joined by Beebe, of New York, who, in the most excited manner, protested against the action of the Speaker, and who, in order to make himself still more conspicuous, jumped up on his desk, and from there gesticulated wildly, shouting at the top of his voice expressions which, in the uproar and excitement, were entirely unintelligible at the reporter's desk. At this time every member on the Democratic side, and nearly every one on the Republican side, was on his feet. The storm, however, was entirely confined to the Democratic side of the chamber, the Republicans merely participating as spectators. The galleries were crowded to their utmost capacity, and so were the spaces at the back of the outer row of seats; and from these, as well as from desks of members, came murmurs and loud hisses as this wild scene was enacted. The Sergeant-at-Arms, with his mace of office, appeared in the most disorderly parts of the assemblage, and Mr. Beebe stepped down from his elevated position and addressed the Speaker in a more moderate tone from his own place. Then the spaces behind the outer row of desks were cleared. By degrees the storm lulled, and, although there were some lesser renewals of it, the Speaker managed at about 2 o'clock to launch the House fairly into the two-hours' discussion on the Vermont objections. The debate was opened by Mr. Poppleton, who soon yielded to enable Mr. Hewitt, of New York, to relate how he came into possession of the package produced by him yesterday, and how he had last seen it in the possession of the Secretary of the Senate, who stated that it was the private property of Mr. Ferry, and that he proposed as a friend of Mr. Ferry to retain it.

After a good deal of colloquy in regard to what had become of the paper, a messenger from the Senate came into the hall and tendered the package to Hewitt, who refused to receive it, and thereupon announced the fact to the House. No immediate action was taken in the matter. The young lad who carried the package retained it in his possession, and took a seat awaiting the action of the House, and the discussion proceeded, Mr. Hendee explaining that the case of Vermont was only a minor form of the case in Oregon, the exception being that in Oregon Cronin had the certificate of the Governor, while Aldrich, the person claiming to be an elector in the Vermont case, had not, but acted entirely on his own motion.

The members who participated in the discussion were Messrs. Joyce, Hendee, Denison, Poppleton, Monroe, Hooker, Money, Wilson (W. Va.), Marsh, Haymond and Levy.

Mr. Garfield read a letter from Mr. Gorham, Secretary of the Senate, saying that he had put the package purporting to be the second certificate in his pocket, as the package looked like a private communication, but, being admonished that his reception of it might be construed as the reception of it by President Ferry, he took it from his pocket and placed it on the desk, and since that time he had not seen the package.

Mr. Hewitt remarked that the package had been brought to him by a messenger from the Senate, who would not tell from whom he received it.

The Speaker asked Mr. Garfield to suspend his remarks till order was restored.

Mr. Garfield—I will wait till Ajax and the other chiefs have quieted their troubles. [After a pause.] There is no pretense or claim that under any law the President of the Senate ought to receive a paper under such circumstances. There is no signature on the back of the paper authenticating it. For aught that we know it is another mock certificate. If anybody has been deceived by the pretense that we ought to have a paper opened in this House coming in such a roundabout, unauthorized way, let all such pretenses be cleared away, and let them vote with the knowledge of the fact that a vote for the resolution is simply a vote to prevent a count, and to bring us into anarchy.

Mr. Stone, who was one of the tellers, stated that he saw the Secretary of the Senate throw the package under the desk, and among the rubbish; that he (Stone) immediately wrote a note to Mr. Hewitt, and that Hewitt and he had a conversation during which he saw the Secretary take the package from under the desk and put it in his pocket.

The discussion was closed by Mr. Field, who expressed his deep regret that the day had been consumed in an attempt to rectify the mistake of the President of the Senate, an egregious mistake which the dignity and self-respect of the House compelled it to rectify if possible. He would not go into any question about the vote of Vermont, whether it was good or bad, or whether the paper was of any value. All that we knew was that a question had arisen respecting it, which the President of the Senate had assumed to decide for himself. He denied that the President of the Senate had any power to do anything except to keep order, and to do what had been committed to him under the Electoral law, and all knew that this was the very question that lay at the foundation of all debates on the subject. From the beginning of the session it had been maintained by the Republicans that the President of the Senate could count the votes, and on that they had stirred up the country and subsidized the press, had procured legal opinions, and what had they come to at last? The Senate itself had in solemn debate repudiated the doctrine as not worth one moment's consideration, and the President of the United States, in a solemn message to Congress, declared that never in the history of the Government had the President of the Senate assumed to decide any question. That official did now assume to decide this question whether or not that was a return to be opened by him. If the members of the House consented to that, let them look to the future. Their principle was the rule of [illegible] and the rule of law. The Commons of England had gained the liberties of the English people, which had made the Anglo-Saxon race the glory of the earth, by standing on the smallest question that concerned their liberties. So the House of Representatives should not give up one jot or tittle of its rights. It was the duty of the President of the Senate when that paper was before him to submit the question (if he had any doubt about it) to the two houses, and the only remedy now was to invite him back to open the paper in the presence of both houses. If there were two returns from Vermont they should go to the Electoral Commission. He appealed to the members to deal with the question not as Democrats or Republicans, but as guardians of the rights of the House in the electoral count.

In reply to a question by Mr. Cate, he said that there was no time fixed by law in which a certificate must be filed.

Mr. Hoar—Is there not a source fixed by law through which these returns shall come?

Mr. Field—It is not fixed by law. You men, you Judges, have decided that the law cannot contravene the constitution, nor can Congress make a law that binds the States. Congress could not do it, and has not done it. It passed the law of 1792 that certificates should be sent in by the first Wednesday in February, and, if not, the Secretary of State should send for them. He could send for them any time before the two houses met. That is the law if it was not repealed by this Electoral Commission law, which declares that all certificates and papers purporting to be certificates which shall have been received shall be opened. I have answered the objection that this certificate has not been received, because it ought to have been received. In point of fact, it was received in your presence. It was delivered by the member from New York (Hewitt) to the President of the Senate. Was it for him to reject it? Are the representatives of the people to submit to that? Are the Republicans to submit to it? If you do, look for 1881. Let this House put down its heel at once and forever on the doctrine that the President of the Senate is anything more than the presiding officer; the guardian of those credentials until they are opened, and that it is his duty to open them and submit to the two Houses every question that shall arise.

The debate being closed, and the question being on the resolution offered by Mr. Poppleton, Mr. Knott moved the following amendment:

Resolved, That this House requires that the package tendered by the member from New York (Hewitt) to the President of the Senate in the presence of the two houses yesterday, and purporting to be a certificate of the electoral votes for President and Vice President from the State of Vermont, shall be opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two houses, and, if found to be such a certificate, the same shall be submitted together with the certificate read in the presence of the two houses to the Electoral Commission for its judgment and decision, and that the Senate be requested to make a like order requiring the President of the Senate to open such package in the presence of the two houses, and that until such order be made the House will not be ready to meet the Senate and proceed with the count of electoral votes.

As the vote progressed on this resolution, and as there was an apparent prospect of its having a majority in its favor, the most intense excitement prevailed throughout the hall. Finally the vote was announced as yeas, 116; nays, 148.

Mr. Mills, of Texas, offered the following:

WHEREAS, On the 7th of November, 1876, an election was held in the several States for electors for President and Vice President, at which the election of a majority of said electors favorable to the election of Samuel J. Tilden for President, and Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice President, were duly and constitutionally elected; and

WHEREAS, The returns of said election in the States of Louisiana and Florida were duly made to officers in said States whose duty it was under the law to aggregate the votes and certify the names of electors; and

WHEREAS, Said Returning Officers willfully, corruptly, and fraudulently suppressed the votes of those electors who were duly and legally elected, and falsely and fraudulently certified the election of persons who were defeated at the ballot-box; and

WHEREAS, The Governors of said States falsely and fraudulently gave certificates of election to said persons who were defeated, and refused them to those persons who were elected; and

WHEREAS, Said false and fraudulent certificates were referred to a commission to investigate and report to Congress the true and constitutional electoral votes of said States; and

WHEREAS, Said commission refused to investigate the question as to who were the true constitutional electors chosen by the qualified voters of said States; and

WHEREAS, It appears in the count of the electoral votes in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives that on account of said frauds in suppressing the true votes and certifying false votes, Samuel J. Tilden, although having received a majority of the electoral votes cast at the ballot-boxes in the several States, has not a majority in said joint count of all the electors appointed in accordance with the terms of the Constitution; and

WHEREAS, Rutherford B. Hayes has not received a majority of the constitutional electors duly and legally appointed, and the contingency provided for by the constitution having happened when it becomes the duty of the House of Representatives to proceed immediately to the election of President of the United States for the ensuing four years; therefore,

Resolved, By the House of Representatives, That said House proceed immediately, in obedience to the constitution, to choose a President from the persons having the highest number of votes, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President.

Mr. Mills made a speech in favor of his resolution, in which he characterized the representatives of the American people as cowering in the dust. The people, he said, dare maintain their rights, but the people's representatives dare not do so. Their fathers, if they could look down upon them from heaven, would be ashamed to see them cowering before a despot who only commanded an army of about 18,000 men, one-half of whom sympathized with the Democratic party.

Mr. Blackburn said: To-day is Friday. On that day the Savior of the world suffered crucifixion between two thieves. On this Friday constitutional government, judicial honesty, fair dealing and decency suffer crucifixion among a number of thieves. It was on that day that this Presidential fraud received his nomination at the hands of a party convention. It was on that day, as it recurred, that every determination reached by the blistered, perjured miscreants who constitute a majority of this commission has been promulgated. It is on that day that you propose to consummate your iniquity, but the people will at length rise to punish even, perhaps in blood, the perpetrators of all the scoundrelism and villainy of this proceeding.

Mr. Williams, of Wisconsin, replied to Blackburn, saying that there was no day more fitting than hangman's day, and no hour more fitting than that at which graveyards yawn, for the gibbeting to death of the bastard party of political reform which had vexed the eyes of good men for the last twelve months.

How a Blind Woman Threads a Needle.

Among the patients who sought treatment at Dr. Chisolm's free eye and ear dispensary yesterday were two sisters, one 84 and the other 80 years of age, who lived together for mutual support. The younger is totally blind, and yet she does the family sewing. She retains such delicacy of touch that she can thread an ordinary-sized needle with ease, and even a fine one after a few efforts. Having cut off square the end of the thread, she holds it fixed between her fingers and brings the eye of the needle up to it, and often at the first trial passes the end of the thread through the eye.—Baltimore Sun.

SATURDAY, March 3.—SENATE.—The Revenue and Appropriation bills were reported from the House. The Senate immediately took up the Revenue bill and passed it without a dissenting vote.... The Senate then went into committee of the whole on the General Appropriation bill. After making a number of amendments the bill was passed.... A message was read from the House stating that the House refused to concur in the Senate amendments to the Appropriation bill, and asking the Senate to recede from its action. The Senate then passed a resolution refusing to recede, and asking for a committee of conference. The Secretary announced that the House had adjourned, and for that reason he was unable to inform the House of the Senate's action.

HOUSE.—The Specific Appropriation bill was read a third time and defeated, by a vote of 32 to 60. TUESDAY, March 6.—SENATE.—The Senate was called to order at 10 a. m. Auditor of State Henderson called the roll, and forty members answered to their names. The old officers were re-elected. The old rules were readopted, with the exception of an additional one giving the appropriation bills precedence over all other business, and requiring a two-thirds vote to take up any other business....A concurrent resolution was adopted for a sine die adjournment on Monday, March 12....The Finance Committee was instructed to prepare the appropriation bills at once....The Senate then repaired to the Hall of the House to hear the Governor's message....The Finance Committee introduced the General Appropriation bill, which is similar to that introduced in the House by the Ways and Means Committee several days ago....The Senate held an evening session to consider the General Appropriation bill, and, after making several amendments thereto, adjourned.

HOUSE.—Secretary of State Neff called the House to order, and read the Governor's message concerning a special session. The old officers were re-elected, and the rules of the last session were re-adopted....A resolution was adopted that after the business pending and the appropriation bills were disposed of, the House would adjourn sine die....The Ways and Means Committee was instructed to report the Appropriation bills as soon as possible....House bills were passed creating the office of School Director in each school district, and allowing unmarried women having children under their charge to vote for such Directors; requiring certain officers of foreign express companies to file a statement with County Recorders of the counties in which they do business; limiting the number of Justices of the Peace, and legalizing contracts made by agents of foreign insurance companies when such have not complied with the law in filing their authority with County Auditors.....Both houses then went into joint convention to hear the Governor's message....At the conclusion of the message, bills were passed requiring County Commissioners to give additional bonds; defining the powers of cities over streets and alleys; abolishing the cat in prisons; increasing the jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace, and amending the Fee and Salary law in relation to County Treasurers.

FRUIT HOUSE PRICES.

No dull times with us---Our trade continually on he increase.

No secret about it, simply purchasing our goods in large quantities of first hands and selling direct to our customers at a small profit, thereby saving them the profits of the middle men which adds 15 to 20 per cent.; even forty per cent on some goods. This saving we are bound to give to our customers.

Take tea for instance: The advance on that article from the time it arraves in New and is sold to the speculator, and from him to the jobber, and from the jobber to the wholesale grocer, and from the wholesale grocer to the retail dealer, is at least 30 per cent. As each of these dealers has to make his 5 to 10 per cent. on the sale, and then the retailer, he must have his profit, and by the time it reaches the consumer there is at least 50 per cent added to it. We cut all these off by ordering direct from the importer and selling direct to the consumer. When we first commenced, our trade was two chests a month and now it is as many chests a day. So with all other goods Sugars Coffees, Tobaccoes, Fish, Spice or anything we deal in, we purchase at the first hands and resell direct to the consumer and save the profits of the middle dealers.

Figures are what is wanted

Not election majorities, but such as interest the great army of American producers. Twenty-five years ago the eight counties of Missouri, now traversed by the Old Reliable Hanibal & St. Joseph Railroad were nearly a wilderness. To-day, by a late census, it is discovered that these counties produce over one-fourteenth of the entire wheat crop of the entire State, over one-twelfth of the corn crop, and over one-ninth of the oats. The same growth of country is now being repeated in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and New Mexico, and the immortal Greeley had this identical route and section of country in mind when he breath those stirring words of wisdom, "Young man, go West." Therefore, it is but naturia that parties taking this advice should desire to pass over a road that has done so much for a great State, (especially as it offers the best facilities) and see for themselves. By the Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad, through cars are run from Cleveland and Toledo, and thro' connections made from Cincinnati and Indianapolis, via Quincy, to St. Jo., Atchison and Kansas City, and from Chicago to Kansas City without change. We are about to issue, in connection with our own, a county map of Colorado and New Mexico, giving valuable information as regards time tables, routes, distances, altitudes, &c., which we will be pleased to furnish free, upon application in person or by letter addressed to

A Mistake of Hayes.

A little error crept into the president's inaugural. He inadvertently said "called to the duties of this great trust." He was never called. A majority of 260,000 in the popular vote and a majority of 19 in the electoral vote decided that Tilden should be president of the United States. Fraud, forgery and perjury wrested this well earned victory of the people from their hands, and gave Hayes a majority of one in the electoral vote. Hayes was not called; the office was deliberately stolen for him. It was seized by a conspiracy of force and fraud.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

There are men in the country who cry out against popular suffrage. They attribute to it the evils from which the nation now suffers. But they are all wrong. Popular suffrage has stood the test well, and at the last election it gloriously vindicated itself. Against the millions raised by the party in power from its hundred thousand officeholders and its numerous rings, against artful appeals to selfish business and corporate interests, and against the vote of the blacks, driven to the polls by carpet bag leaders, the people won a great and complete victory. Even in the States where the Republicans had always been strongest, their majorities were largely reduced' and some of them only saved by the skin of their teeth. But now the people are to be cheated out of the fruit of that victory so gallantly won. —New York Sun.

Come in Little Blue Jeans

The correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazettee tells the following pleasant little story: At the Occidental Hotel, where Governor Williams has his headquarters, Mrs. Dessar, a very handsome lady boards, who has a little wide awake four or five year old daughter. This little daughter, the other day, captured a little grand daughter of Governor Williams in the hall, insisted that she should come to her mother's room. Her manner of introduction was funny. While her little new found friend hung bashfully against the door-post with her finger in her mouth, she stepped in and said: "Mamma this is little Blue Jeans, and don't be a fraid its my mamma." Her mother some what mortified, reprimanded her, but little Jessie couldn't see why, if her friends grandpa was Blue Jeans, and little Blue Jeans she bids fair to called by all in the house.

A Balky Cow Surrenders to Steam.

Last evening a ranch band arrived by the San Rafael ferry in charge of a milch cow and its young calf, which he was to deliver to a family residing in the Western Addition. He tied the legs of the calf, dispatched it to its destination on a truck, and followed up Clay street, leading the cow by a stout halter with a long, flat, strong leather shank. He had little trouble till he got between Kearney and Dupont streets, when the cow planted its fore legs at a resolute angle of forty-five degrees with the street railroad track. The driver exhausted every variety of cowdosing known to the profession. He went ahead and tried to pull her along; he went behind and argued with her, twisting her tail into a short and cranking spiral; he tried various devices kindly suggested by the crowd that had gathered around, and finally fell back on the eloquent profanity fashionable on a thoroughly conductive dairy ranch.

But the cow was stubborn and wouldn't move, and the desperate vaquero had just come to the conclusion that he could only wait helplessly and witness the terrible telescopic tragedy with the dummy of the next up train, when an ingeuious and airily-dressed young Barbary coaster took the job off his hands. He slipped the end of the halter shank flatwise through the slot in the street railroad track, and dropped it on one side of the moving wire beneath; then he reversed his attenuated cane and slipped it through and passed the wire on the other side; then he twisted the hooked top of his cane around, caught the end of the shank, drew it up through the slot, tied it with the slipping knot around the standing part of the shank, then he drew the knot through the slot and tight around the wire. The halter shank stretched out, but it was the toughest and best tanned leather; the cow's horns cracked, but declined to come out of her head; the vertebræ of her neck elongated, but stuck to the remainder of her body; there was an instant abnormal strain on the engines over the hill, and a clatter of the great wheel in the Kearney street well for taking up the slack, then the cow reluctantly raised on foot and set it down again quick, then another and set it down quicker, and then she surrendered to the superior powers of steam and wire cable and trotted rapidly off. With head down and tail up, like an eager and well-trained setter beating a stubble field for birds, she went over the hills and far away. Dexter couldnt have made as good time up the grades. John Gilpin's ride never attracted so many astonished eyes. As she went over the divide and let out a link or two on the down grade the train men at the terminus were thrown into a temporary panic at the new and inexplicable dummy bearing down on them, but one of them had the presence of mind to cut her loose before she was in and cut into steaks on the friction wheels. She was a little out of breath and a trifle astonished at her own outcome of speed, but she was cured of balking, and continued without further trouble on to her new residence.

THE TRIUMPH OF ART IN RAILROAD TRAVEL.

Year by year we note the footsteps of progress in many directions. In no direction is progress more palpable than in the facilities offered the railroad traveler of the present day.—Looking back but a few years, we can see the snail-like advance made day by day by the emigrant's wagon, as it was slowly but surely drawn toward sundown by the patient ox, or the slowly moving farm horse; then came the old fashioned stage coach; following closely, we had the canal packet; then the steamer on the lakes and rivers; then the locomotive engine and the stage like cars. Now! the palatial coach, and more than palatial drawing room and sleeping car. Yet, not satisfied with these, that marvel of mammoth western corporation, the Chicago & North-Western Railway, as we stated some weeks ago, has developed hotel cars that will, for elegance, usefulness and real comfort, eclipse everything of the kind that has been hitherto placed in service on any road. Some of our readers seem to have some doubts about the merits of hotel cars, or their superority over the so-called dinning cars, that is run for a few miles on some roads. "I am not so sure about that," said one of our friends, as he had finished reading our first article about these hotel coaches that are to be run on the Omaha and California line of the Chicago & North-Western Railway. "I am not so sure I would care to take my dinner in any car, no matter how much like a palace, while it was running at the rate of forty miles an hour." It is a saying, "that the faster you run the safer." Why, last June it will be remembered, that this road hauled from Chicago to Council Bluffs, in less than ten hours, the now celebrated "Jarrett and Palmer Train," on that train was a hotel car, not as large, with less wheels under it, poorer springs, and in no way as strong and easy for riding in as these new cars are to be, and yet, Mr. Jarrett said "while on the Chicago & North-Western line, running at an average rate of fifty miles an hour, we took our breakfast as comfortly as we would at Delmonico's, in New York."

It is well known that the Chicago & North Western Railway is built over the most favorable line as to grades that could be found between Chicago and the Missouri River, with but few curves its track is mostly of heavy steel rail, gravel ballasted, with wide roadway, giving it permanence and solidity—it is as smooth as a floor; all its cars streng, with plenty of wheels under them, and with springs so adjusted that the usual "bouncing" and oscillation is reduced to the minimum. We observed last week that in an ordinary car the side motion and raising and falling of the car was less than half an inch, and sometimes scarcely preceptable. We believe it will be found that a person will sit in these hotel cars and eat or write as comfortably as he could at his desk or table at home; this we choose to call the triumph of art in railway travel.

We learn that this new line of hotel cars is being pushed to completion as fast as the full force of workmen in the Pullman shops can do it. We shall be certain to see them in a few weeks.

THE OLD CANOE.

BY ALBERT PIKE.

Where the rocks are gray and the shore is steep,
And the waters below look dark and deep,
Where the rugged pine, in its lonely pride,
Leans gloomily over the murky tide,
Where the reeds and rushes are long and rank,
And the weeds grow thick on the winding bank,
Where the shadow is heavy the whole day through,
There lies at its moorings the old canoe.

The useless paddles are idly dropped,
Like a sea-bird's wings that the storms had lopped,
And crossed on the railing one o'er one,
Like the folded hands when the work is done;
While busily back and forth between
The spider stretches his silvery screen,
And the solemn owl, with his dull "too-hoo,"
Settles down on the side of the old canoe.

The stern, half sunk in the slimy wave,
[illegible]
And the green moss creeps o'er its dull decay,
Hiding its moldering dust away,
Like the hand that plants o'er the tomb a flower,
Or the ivy that mantles the falling tower;
While many a blossom of loveliest hue
Springs up o'er the stern of the old canoe.

The currentless waters are dead and still,
But the light wind plays with the boat at will,
And lazily in and out again
It floats the length of the rusty chain,
Like the weary march of the hands of time,
That meet and part at the noontide chime;
And the shore is kissed at each turning anew,
By the dripping bow of the old canoe.

Oh, many a time, with a careless hand,
I have pushed it away from the pebbly strand,
And paddled it down where the stream runs quick,
Where the whirls are wild and the eddies are thick,
And laughed as I leaned o'er the rocking side,
And looked below in the broken tide,
To see that the faces and boats were two,
That were mirrored back from the old canoe;

But now, as I lean o'er the crumbling side,
And look below in the sluggish tide,
The face that I see there is graver grown,
And the laugh that I hear has a soberer tone,
And the hands that lent to the light skiff wings
Have grown familiar with sterner things;
But I love to think of the hours that sped,
As I rocked where the whirls their white spray shed,
Ere the blossoms waved, or the green grass grew
O'er the moldering stern of the old canoe.

READY MONEY.

"So you are going to be married, Kate? Well, I hope you have made a wise choice."

"O yes, uncle," I replied lightly; "I know I have. Henry is to make me perfectly happy."

"[illegible]" was the next pleasant observation that fell from Uncle Jocelyn's lips.

"Got? uncle! I don't know what you mean," I answered, growing rosy red at the unexpected inquiry.

"What are his means? What does he intend to settle upon you?"

"He has his business," promptly interrupted my mother.

"And he is so clever, he is sure to get on," I added, in my eagerness to assure Uncle Jocelyn it was all right as regarded my future.

"That will depend a great deal upon you, Kate," he replied gravely. "The wife has more to do in making or marring her husband than is generally suspected. A careless, extravagant, bad wife is the greatest curse a man can have; a good one is the greatest blessing."

"Yes, uncle; O yes," I assented, glancing toward my mother, who was smiling somewhat scornfully, I fancied, at his opinion.

"Take care of his pence, and his pounds will take care of themselves," continued uncle; "and beware of ever getting into debt, Kate; it's the easiest thing to get into, and the hardest thing to get out of. Take my advice; live well within your means and always pay ready money."

"Yes, uncle; O yes," I responded. "I am sure you are right; and Henry is so prudent, he is certain to have the best ideas."

"Well, keep them before your own mind. Don't despise an old man's counsel; buy nothing that you can't afford, and always pay ready money."

I remember that conversation so well with Uncle Jocelyn, some few weeks before my marriage; at the time it did not strike me so forcibly as afterward, for my mind was too much filled with other and to me more interesting matters.

Uncle Jocelyn was an old man, and the amount of his fortune had always been wrapped in some obscurity; but he lived comfortably, and possessed a small property in Berkshire, upon which he had built a pretty and substantial house, where I had often spent many happy days. He had always shown a special affection for me, no doubt owing to the fact of my being the daughter of his only brother, who had died when I was quite an infant, leaving me to the sole guardianship of my mother. Unfortunately for me, there had never been any love lost between the latter and Uncle Jocelyn; the coolness had rather increased than diminished as years went by; and when invitations were sent for us to visit Conington, which was the name of my uncle's place, my mother invariably refused for herself, and only with great persuasion permitted me to go.

How I enjoyed these visits! How sweet were the hay-fields and clover-scented meadows! How cool and fresh the marble-slabbed dairy, with its rows of brimming basins of frothy golden cream! How fragrant was the old-fashioned garden, with its long, grassy walks and great big dewy roses, and the old cedar tree so shady, under which Uncle Jocelyn would sit of an afternoon smoking, listening apparently quite satisfied with my childish conversation! The sun always seemed to be shining in those days. I can recall no gloom then, and things all wore a charm, which I did not know lay chiefly in the fact of my own youth and utter ignorance of life and its cares.

However, not to digress, I had not seen so much of Uncle Jocelyn since I had grown up, partly on account of my mother's unabated dislike to him, partly because of the existence of a new interest in life. I had met Henry Arden. He was six-and-twenty, five years my senior. His position in life was a fairly good one, he having a small interest in a first-rate city business which gave him over £300 a year; his character was irreproachable; and when I say that he was a general favorite wherever he went it may be surmised that in my opinion he was, if not quite perfect, very akin to it. For myself, I was passable—perhaps a little more than that—but I was penniless until my mother died; so it was a very astonishing thing to me how so desirable a parti had fallen to my lot. He was certain to get on—the senior partners had been known to say so themselves. Consequently our start in life promised to be a fair one. And to be brief, we were married. Our honeymoon was of comparatively short duration, but it was long enough to cost Henry, as I afterwards learned, something like £40, which was a considerable out of £300 a year; for it had not occurred to him to lay by any spare cash for those unavoidable expenses. I had felt rather uneasy at the expenditure, but it was too early days to venture on any remonstrance had I been so inclined; we were sure to live very quietly when we once settled down, and could easily then make up for any little extravagance of which at the outset we had been guilty. We were to live in London, and we were fully agreed on one point; lodgings were not to be thought of; we must have a house of our own. The prospect of possessing one jointly with Henry was very pleasant to me. I pictured an endless fund of amusement and occupation, too, in furnishing and adorning it; but the mansion had still to be selected; so our first business was to find one to suit us, the next to get into it as soon as possible.

We must have spent a small fortune in cab-hire before we found just what we wanted; even then, though the situation was good and the domicile desirable, the rent rather frightened us; it was 80 guineas a year, unfurnished, but we should be so comfortable in it. The smallness of its size—and it was extremely small—was rather an advantage than otherwise, as it would require so little furniture; and two maids would be amply sufficient for our establishment, which in such a place would be a most creditable menage.

We were delighted with the house, the balcony to the drawing-room being, as we enthusiastically agreed, almost worth the rent itself; and we made no resistance when the house agent, who must have had some amusement over our innocence and inexperience, fixed us for a seven-years' lease, representing to us that our advantages were almost unequaled, having no premium to pay. We consented—in consideration of all he enumerated in favor of our bargain—to make any repairs that were necessary; and in fact were in such delight with the whole affair that the agreement, as might have been expected, was very easily arrived at.

We knew nothing about furnishing; never dreamed of the dangers of green wood or the inevitable results of cheap investment; thinking ourselves very acute to get hold of two furnishing lists to compare prices; besides which we sat down with paper and pencil to calculate exactly how much we must spend; and and I, remembering Uncle Josceelyn's advice, ventured to say that we should resolve not to go beyond it. We came to the conclusion that actual necessaries might be bought, taking the prices from the books, for £150; so Henry decided on borrowing £200, with which we felt sure the house could be really nicely done, and this sum he was to pay interest for until the principal was paid off.

Nothing could have surpassed our prudence—before we set out. When we got into the shop we had selected as the one to patronize, we found that the things we had thought of were very inferior to our imaginings; a trifle more here and a trifle there could make no difference in the sum total, and be everything in the niceness and prettiness of our house; besides which our estimates of necessaries proved a very inadequate one when innumerable etceteras were declared absolutely indispensable by the attendant shopkeeper. We made apparently endless purchases, which we could hardly remember until they were deposited in Amberley villas, where, with my newly engaged domestics, I awaited them with immense delight.

But vast as the importation appeared, I had yet to learn of the legion of wants undreamed of by us. Scarcely a day passed without some new demand being made, which apparently it was perfectly impossible to do without. But at last I was thoroughly satisfied with our possessions, and the servants seemed to have come to the end of their requirements; so the only thing that we had to think of was the bill, which had not yet been sent in to us. I was frightened to think about it; but Henry was quite prepared for its being considerably over the £200. Judge of our dismay when we did receive it to find it more than twice that sum—£456 odd! There were frightful entries for "Time," which in themselves represented a serious item, and upon which we had never calculated; and our small sundries, which we had hardly at all taken into account, came to something quite appalling.

But the first shock over, the offending document was thrust aside—it would be paid all in good time; and for the present we both resolved to dismiss it from our minds. Friends were rapidly gathering around us; we must receive and pay visits; so it was not very difficult to banish disagreeables, and to enter with the greatest enjoyment into the new life which lay before us. I had fancied our house was very complete and perfect until I saw some of the elegant drawing-rooms of some of our new acquaintances; after that many deficiencies were plainly visible; and in order to supply them we went to different shops, making various purchases, which, as usual, were put down to our account. Then came our first entertainment with its attendant expenses, which it was absolutely impossible to avoid; for in Henry's position it was, as we thought, most necessary for us to maintain a good appearance; and, as his wife, it was incumbent upon me to dress as well and as fashionably as I could.

So things went on; and before we had been married two years I need hardly say we were hopelessly and horribly in debt. To retrench seemed utterly impossible. I hardly knew where our extravagance lay; but the fact remained, we were living far beyond our income; our bills were never-ending, and every day we were sinking deeper and deeper into the mire. To add to our difficulties, a nursery had been established, and, though one might imagine so small an addition was not a serious one, it cost us no trifling sum. I could not have endured to see my baby badly dressed. How could I have seen it go out except in the sweetest and freshest of garments? So it was duly adorned in the whitest and prettiest things, which insured a satisfactory amount of patronage for our laundress, and most appalling bills for me. However, we managed to keep afloat in some wonderful manner; but Henry was beginning to have a strangely careworn look, to which I could not blind myself. He was worried and harassed. His business was all right; but there were bills to be met, difficulties to be disposed of which he could not quite see the end of.

To outward appearance, however, we seemed a very prosperous pair. Our house was now as elegant as our neighbors'. I had a thousand costly little trifles lying about the drawing-room, got from time to time, and, as usual, not paid for, some of which the storekeepers themselves had pressed me into purchasing. Sometimes a sharp pang shot through me when I thought over our position, and I wished when we had first set up that I had had sufficient sense to persuade Henry to do so more in accordance with our income than we had done; but it was too late now; we must trust to some good fortune turning up. Henry had hopes that his partners meant to promote him, and if they were realized we should be much better off. This idea was buoying us both up, and we were feeling particularly sanguine when Mr. Trevor, the senior partner, a peculiar man, who never almost left his own house in Bedford square, except for the office, announced his intention of coming to Amberly Villas to dine, if we would have him. In our anxiety to impress him favorably we launched out into further expenses. He must be handsomely entertained, so much might depend upon his visit. Accordingly, I arranged a most recherche little dinner, and had the table laid out a la Russe to my entire satisfaction; when everything was completed, surveying the preparation with the utmost confidence in Mr. Trevor's verdict. But alas! for Henry's hopes and my dinner. Mr. Trevor came, partook very sparingly and silently of our hospitality, and departed without having dropped one syllable on the subject which we were so hoping he would discuss.

Some ten days afterward the advance in the business was bestowed upon one of Henry's juniors who had never dreamt of getting it. We were terribly disappointed, having counted so surely upon an addition to our means; and, when our wrathful feelings were at their height, who should suddenly walk in but Uncle Jocelyn! He had never been in our house since we were married. It was, in fact, a great event for him to leave Conington, but the freak had seized him, He wanted to see his old favorite and his new grandniece, so he had come. He only meant to stay for the day; in the evening he intended to return home. In my inmost heart I was as fond of him as ever, but his visit was ill-timed. I could not rally from my disappointment for Henry, and our cares were now assuming too serious an aspect to be easily set aside.

"You have a beautiful little house, Kate," he said. "I had no notion Henry was such a rich man."

"Hadn't you, uncle?" I said, trying to laugh unconstrainedly.

"I am truly pleased to see you so comfortable," continued Uncle Jocelyn, kindly. "This room must have cost you a pretty penny, Kate; and I daresay you have a nest-egg somewhere as well."

"Oh, it isn't very much," I answered, really referring to the room, but, as he thought, to the nest-egg; and imagining I meant that the latter, though of small proportions, did exist, he responded most cordially:

"Doesn't matter how small, Kate; there's plenty of time to make it larger."

It was no use undeceiving him, though at that very moment an ominous envelope was delivered to me with the announcement that the person who brought it was waiting for an answer; to which I returned the usual formula, that Mr. Arden was out, but would call in a day or two. I tried to look as indifferent as possible, but I felt Uncle Jocelyn's eyes were upon me, and my face colored painfully, nor did my confusion escape the kind scrutiny. I felt thoroughly convinced he had drawn his own conclusions. Soon afterward lunch was announced, and we descended to the drawing-room, where Sophy, my parlor-maid, had, to my horror, arranged some of our best china on the table, with the best intentions I knew, meaning to impress my visitor with our grandeur, but little imagining the real effect such superfluities would have upon my uncle. He noticed it directly, and admired it very much.

"Where did you get that figure?" he asked, indicating a lovely china center-piece.

"I am not quite certain," I replied, carelessly; "we have had it for some time."

"Was it very expensive?" pursued Uncle Jocelyn.

"O no, not very; at least I didn't think so," I answered, recollecting with a painful throb that it certainly had not cost us much as yet, considering that we had not paid for it.

I need not give all the details of Uncle Jocelyn's visit. Suffice it to say that it was one of martyrdom that afternoon to me; and it was a positive relief when his kind old face vanished and I found myself alone once more. He had gone away no doubt thinking our lines were in very pleasant places, feeling assured not only of our prosperity, but our happiness. Poor deceived Uncle Jocelyn! He little knew that I was just longing to throw myself into his arms and make a clean breast of all our extravagance and consequent troubles. How I envied him going back to quiet, peaceful Conington! How I wished Henry and I were just one-half as happy as he was.

However, our struggle then was just beginning, for we sank deeper and deeper. It was like a quicksand—the more we struggled the deeper we got. We dare not openly retrench—we lacked the moral courage; and our private attempts were the merest drops in the ocean of that mighty sea into which we had drifted, simply and solely because we had at the outset ignored the golden rule, so impressed upon me by Uncle Jocelyn, to live within our means and to pay ready money. And what had all our extravagance done for us? We had a large visiting list, and I periodically paid a host of visits, always hoping to find my friends from home. We had a pretty house, and were able to entertain as elegantly as our neighbors. I had heaps of fashionable dresses and useless finery; and Henry was as perfect as ever in my eyes; but we were both miserable; debt stared us in the face whichever way we turned; and how long we could keep our creditors at bay was beginning to be a source of considerable anxiety to us.

Henry's position in his business depended solely upon the pleasure of the senior partners. There were curious conditions in their agreement with him; and if they heard of his embarrassment no doubt it would injure him greatly, and might make them consider themselves justified in perhaps something far more serious than a remonstrance. O that we had acted differently! that the past could be lived over again with our present experience.

Once or twice I thought of confiding our woes to my mother; but I dared not; intuitively I knew that, although in his prosperity Henry was a great favorite with her, she would regard him very differently if misfortunes came; and I felt I could bear anything rather than hear him blamed, especially as in my most inmost heart I knew I was equally if not actually more to blame than he was; for now I saw clearly how true it was what Uncle Jocelyn said, that a wife can make or mar her husband. If I had quietly set to work at the outset, and advised him aright, all would have been well; but now every day brought some hateful dun or threatening letter. A ring at the bell would cause me to start, and the sound of a man's voice in the hall parleying with Sophy was enough to make me tremble all over.

"The crash could not be staved off for long; a crisis must shortly come." So said Henry one lovely June evening, when we were sitting disconsolately discussing all manner of wild, impossible schemes. It was an exquisite night; the heat of the day was over; not a breath of wind stirred the delicate blossoms of the plants which adorned our balcony, and the moon was rising in all her liquid loveliness, casting a clear, cool light over the scene. Everything looked calm and quiet and peaceful; the pulses of the great city were hushed; there was nothing to break the silence except poor Henry's hopeless tones repeating, "A crisis can't be far off, Kate. What we are to do I know not!"

We fancied the amazement of our friends—the nine days' wonder our misfortunes would cause, little dreaming that our ending had long been confidently predicted by them, and that our hospitality had been roundly censured and condemned by the very partakers of it. Still less did we imagine that Mr. Trevor, so far from being favorably impressed with our surroundings, had gone away—fully aware as he was with the exact amount of Henry's income—shocked and sorry to see that Henry Arden had married a wife with so little sense and judgment; and no second glance from his keen eyes was wanting to prove to him how terribly beyond it we were living. His observations had satisfied him that serious embarrassments must ensue; consequently he and his partners had bestowed the desired post and increased emoluments upon one who, if he needed it less than we did, certainly understood its value better.

So not one except my mother and Uncle Jocelyn would be surprised, though we imagined so differently, as we sat on and on in our pretty drawing-room talking over the weary subject and pondering what we could possibly do. We should have to sell off everything, to leave Amberley Villas, and to begin life over again. Henry's prospects, of course, would be seriously damaged, and we could never hope to thoroughly regain the position our own folly had deprived us of. It was not pleasant to think of; but there could be no shuffling out of the question now; it must be met and answered immediately; what were we to do? Nothing very definite could be arrived at; but one thing was quite clear—the change could not be far off.

I can never describe the anxiety of the days that followed, nor tell the agony it cost me to write and tell my mother that we were hopelessly, desperately involved, and that our difficulties were so great it was impossible for us ever to surmount them. What would she say? What would everybody say? Worst of all, what would Uncle Jocelyn say? For the worst had come to the worst—our house was our own no longer; a man—strange and to me most terrible—was comfortably making himself at home in our kitchen—in other words, he had taken possession! How could Henry show his face at the office! How could I ever venture out again!

I shall never forget the two days that followed after I wrote and told my mother; on the third, when I was almost stupefied with the magnitude of our misfortunes, and during Henry's (poor Henry certainly had the hardest part to bear, for he could not stay quietly at home) absence had shut myself up in my room, some one knocked at the door, and, in answer to my very subdued "Come in," it was gently opened, and not Sophy, as I had anticipated, appeared, but the familiar, friendly face of Uncle Jocelyn.

"My poor child!" he exclaimed—"my little Kate!"—and he folded me in his arms with all the tenderness of a father. "I only heard of it this morning," he said, "and I started off immediately. Cheer up, Kate; don't grieve your old uncle by tears. Things can't be past mending; and I wouldn't be here if I hadn't come to help you."

And how he helped us! Without a word of anger or reproach he listened to Henry's and my story; we told it faithfully, not sparing or attempting to justify ourselves for our culpable conduct; and when all was confessed he simply wrote a check for the full amount of our liabilities. The total was a serious one, but we were saved not only from the disgrace but from Henry's dismissal from a partnership which afterward was the means of our possessing a fortune far beyond what we had ever in our rosiest imaginings dreamed of.

By Uncle Jocelyn's advice we sublet Amberley Villas and retired to a more roomy house in a less expensive and less fashionable locality; we sold all our superfluities, which had become actually hateful to me, and we started once more with a small but certain income.

How much happier we were, and how grateful to Uncle Jocelyn, it would require a far more eloquent pen than mine to describe. He often came to see us, and never had cause to regret the generous help he had so readily extended to us in our need, for he saw how thoroughly repentant we were. My mother joined in the general rejoicing over our regained happiness; and out of gratitude her old prejudice against Uncle Jocelyn faded away.

She often goes to Conington now, where we all meet, a merry party, of which the generous old man is the well-beloved center. He was giving me some gentle hints as to the training of my sons the other day. "For it's a mother's influence that tells upon the man, Kate; it's the lesson she teaches in childhood that he remembers best."

"Yes, Uncle Jocelyn," I answered; "I know you are right. I hope amongst the many things I desire to teach them, one especially mayn't be forgotten—you know what that is?"

"To fear God," replied Uncle Jocelyn, reverently.

"That first of all," I answered; "but I meant something else."

"What?" queried Uncle Jocelyn.

"Never to buy what they can't afford, and always to pay ready money."—Chambers' Journal.

"That Leetle Tim."

The boy with the basket of apples was half an hour late yesterday at the Central Station for the first time in six months, and when he came in he was without his basket, and his eyes were red and swollen. He's been such a straight, square boy that he has many friends on this corner, and he was at once asked if the boot-blacks had been cobbing him.

"No, not that," he said, "but don't you remember that 'Leetle Tim,' who came here once in a while with me?"

"Little Tim! Yes—he is your brother."

"That's what he was, and I was breaking him in to sell apples and make change. Well, little Tim is dead!"

"No?"

"Yes. When I woke up at daylight this morning he was cuddled up to my back, cold and dead! The Lord took him in the night, sir, and wasn't it awful, sir, that I wasn't awake to put my arms over him and hug his little head up under my chin!"

"It's too bad—too bad."

"It's awful on us all, sir. Father's sitting in a corner, crying like a child; mother's weeping and wailing, and the children are smoothing little Tim's curls and calling on him to wake up! That's why I haven't brought the apples, sir, and that's why I won't be here for two or three days. We've got to bury leetle Tim, we have, and I don't see how we can ever gather around the stove again of an evening and be lying in the graveyard! I'm big, sir, but I can't help crying, and father can't help but cry, and I wish—I——!"

And may the Lord seat little Tim at His right hand and give him a crown of glory.—Detroit Free Press.

Thinks He is a Horse.

The other day a man about 45 years old, named Trenton, and living near the Washington Union School, went home and informed his wife that he had turned into a horse. The news didn't surprise her a bit. She has had to support him for the last ten years, and long ago hoped for almost any change. Trenton at once pulled off his boots, coat and vest, strapped a blanket around him, and a corner of the kitchen has been his stall ever since. He paws and neighs like a horse, and many citizens have called to see him. Yesterday morning while a crowd was around the "stall" and the wife was telling them that her husband was always half-fool or lunatic, he let both hind feet fly and hit her on the chin.

"Horse—man—fool or what, I'll have revenge for that," she exclaimed, and she seized him by the hair and kicked his ribs until he called out:

"Wait till this crowd is gone and I'll show you who runs this stall."—Detroit Free Press.

The Famine in India.

The existing famine in the Madras and Bombay Presidencies in India will cost at least $32,000,000. Already in Bombay an area of 54,000 square miles is affected, and in Madras the total area affected is 84,800 square miles. In the two Presidencies 27,000,000 of human beings are suffering. The Indian Government, while anxious to do all in its power, considers it absolutely necessary, in order to avoid national bankruptcy, to exercise the severest economy. The people are to be employed on relief works, but are to be paid only enough to give them a bare subsistence. Private trade in grain will not be interfered with, and the Madras Government has been censured for purchasing 30,000 tons of grain at the beginning of the scarcity. Sir Richard Temple says the Bombay officials have the famine well in hand, but that matters are less satisfactory in Madras, where he found a disposition to expend excessive sums, and to admit to the relief works without exacting the proper tests.

Widely Distributed Animals.

The family of rats is found in nearly every quarter, and bats in every quarter, of the globe. None of the larger land animals are so widely distributed. Among birds, the most extensively found are swallows, kingfishers, pigeons, falcons, owls, rails, snipes, plovers, herons, ducks, petrels, pelicans, and grebes. All of these are found in each of Mr. Wallace's regions, and also in each of their subdivisions. Crows and swifts are universals except in New Zealand, and cuckoos except in the North of North America. Among reptiles, snakes may be mentioned as nearly cosmopolites, being found everywhere except in New Zealand and the tropical islands of the Pacific; while geckoes, or wall-lizards, are absent only from the North of North America. Toads are dispersed over the whole world except Madagascar, New Zealand, and the Pacific islands; and frogs have the same area with the addition of Madagascar.—Chambers' Journal.

The Important Question.

Of all loathsome diseases Catarrh stands pre-eminent. It renders its victim as disgusting to himself as to others. And the most humiliating of all is the consciousness that his presence is offensive to those around him. If any disease deserves the name of universal, it is this. Dietetic errors and the follies which Fashion imposes upon us tend to foster and disseminate it. To the pitiful cry of its victims, is there any cure for Catarrh? there is but one answer consistent with Christian reason. God has never sent one evil into the world for which He has not sent the remedy. For the greatest of all spiritual and moral evils, the Great Physician has prescribed a potent and never-failing remedy. He has given explicit rules for the treatment and preservation of the spiritual and moral man, but He is silent in all matters relating to the physical man. It would be an unwarrantable detraction from His beneficent character to suppose that He has afflicted the greater portion of humanity with an incurable disease. The day of plagues is past. The God of Christianity is a God of Love, of Mercy. His message is "good will to all men." The earth and all contained therein was intended by the Great Designer to supply man's wants; and surely he has no greater wants than remedies for his infirmities. Science is rapidly proving that the earth is intended to supply man's uttermost need. New medicinal plants are constantly being discovered and new properties developed from those already known. For Catarrh, the most potent remedy yet discovered is Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. Its efficacy has been tested in many thousand cases with uniform success. Cases that had been repeatedly pronounced incurable readily yielded to it. In confirmed, or obstinate cases, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery should be taken in connection with the use of the Catarrh Remedy. Full particulars in Pierce's Memorandum Books. They are given away by druggists.

Five Thousand Books Given Away for the Asking.

While Dr. H. James was attached to the British Medical Staff in the East Indies, his high position enabled him to call about him the best chemists, physicians and scientists of the day, and while experimenting with and among the natives, he accidentally made the discovery that CONSUMPTION can be positively and permanently CURED. During the many years of his sojourn there, he devoted his time to the treatment of Lung Diseases, and upon his retirement he left with us books and papers containing full particulars, showing that every one can be his own physician and prepare his own medicine, and such information as we have received we now offer to the public without price, only asking that each remit a three-cent stamp for postage. THE inventors of BURNETT'S COCOAINE—knowing that when the loss of hair occurs, it is generally from that part of the head where the greatest heat is necessarily generated, and that animal fats by their nature induce heat rather than alleviate it—turned their attention and pharmaceutical science toward vegetable oils, as the basis of a medicament to promote the growth and preserve the beauty of the hair. The oleum cocos, or COCOANUT OIL, presented itself most strongly, as possessing many properties peculiarly adapted for the purpose; but its odor was objectionable, and its density (except when exposed to heat) seemed for a long time to defy all efforts to render it available, for popular use, in cooler climates. By a scientific selection of other ingredients, those which will chemically combine with the oil have been discovered, and they together have produced a compound, which is unqualifiedly pronounced to be the best that has yet appeared.

In the form presented, this oil is permanently deodorized, and held in a combination which peculiarly adapts it for the toilet; BURNETT'S COCOAINE is unrivaled in delicacy and agreeableness—cooling in its nature—and possesses such a penetrating affinity for the secretions of the skin, that it is rapidly absorbed.

Its greatest efficacy is best secured by a perfect cleansing, before its application, of the hair and scalp, under which circumstances this oil allays irritation, removes all tendency to dandruff, and invigorates the action of the capillaries in the highest degree. Its effect upon the glossiness and richness of the hair is such as cannot be surpassed; and it is offered to the public in the firm belief that it only requires to be known to supersede all other preparations. We are confident that no one who will make a trial of its efficacy will be willing to return to the use of any other preparation.

GREAT GALES.

The Two Most Destructive Storms Recorded in History.

[From Chambers' Journal.]

The most terrible storm which has, perhaps, ever occurred is that which has been called the Great Storm. It occurred, or rather its worst effects were experienced, on Oct. 10, 1780. Generated, probably, in mid-Atlantic, not far from the equator, it was first felt in Barbadoes, where trees and houses were blown down. Capt. Maury, in his "Physical Geography of the Sea," gives a rather exaggerated account of the effects produced by this storm in Barbadoes, apparently from memory—some of the details being like, but not quite the same as those actually recorded. He says "the bark was blown from the trees, and the fruit of the earth destroyed; the very bottom and depths of the sea were uprooted—forts and castles were washed away, and their great guns carried in the air like chaff." The bark of trees was removed, but it is believed rather through the effects of electric action than by the power of the wind. Cannon, also, were driven along the batteries, and flung over into the fosse, but not "carried in the air like chaff." At Martinique the storm overtook a French transport fleet, and entirely destroyed it. There were forty vessels, conveying 4,000 soldiers, and the Governor of Martinique reported their fate to the French Government in three words—"The vessels disappeared." Nine thousand persons perished at Martinique, and 1,000 at St. Pierre, where not a house was left standing. St. Domingo, St. Vincent, St. Eustache, and Porto Rico were next visited and devastated, while scarcely a single vessel near this part of the cyclone's track was afloat on Oct. 11. At Port Royal the Cathedral, seven churches, and 1,400 houses were blown down, and 1,600 sick and wounded persons were buried beneath the ruins of the hospital. At the Bermudas fifty British ships were driven ashore, two line-of-battle ships went down at sea, and 22,000 persons perished. Perhaps the most remarkable effects of the storm in this portion of its course were experienced in the Leeward Isles. The hurricane drove a 12-pounder cannon a distance of 400 feet. Those who lived in the Government Building took refuge in the central part, where circular walls, nearly a yard thick, seemed to afford promise of safety. But at 11:30 o'clock the wind had broken down parts of these walls, and lifted off the roof. Terrified, they sought refuge in the cellarage, but before long the water had risen there to the height of more than a yard, and they were driven into the battery, where they placed themselves behind the heavier cannons, some of which were driven from their places by the force of the wind. When day broke the country looked as if it had been blasted by fire; not a leaf, scarce even a branch, remained upon the trees.

The Great Storm of 1780 must not be confounded with the storm remembered for many years in Great Britain as the Great Storm. The latter occurred on Nov. 26, 1703, and its worst effects were experienced not as usual in the tropics, but in Western Europe. No other tempest was ever in this country the occasion of a Parliamentary address or of a public fast. Whole fleets had been cast away. Large mansions had been blown down. One prelate had been buried beneath the ruins of his palace. London and Bristol had presented the appearance of cities just sacked. Hundreds of families were still in mourning. The prostrate trunks of large trees, and the ruins of houses, still attested, in all the southern counties, the fury of the blast. One of the most striking events connected with this terrible storm was the destruction of the Eddystone lighthouse. Winstanley, the architect of the first Eddystone lighthouse, was confident that it could resist the fiercest storm which ever blew, and expressed a hope that he might be in it when such a storm raged. On Nov. 26 he arrived with a party of men who were engaged to repair the building. The Great Storm soon after began to blow, and raged throughout the night. On the morning of the 27th no trace of the lighthouse was to be seen.

A Sister's Vengeance.

Some twenty years ago the family of a Mr. Kent, a Government inspector of English factories, awoke one morning to find that a beautiful little boy, Mr. Kent's son by a second wife, was missing, and a search presently revealed the dreadful fact that he had been murdered. For many months the murder remained a mystery. The police, however, at once suspected Mr. Kent's daughter by his first marriage, Constance, and in the end she confessed to the crime. A case very similar occupied last month in a French law court. Marie, aged 20, and Julie, aged 11, were daughters of the Widow Calvet. Julie revealed that Marie, who was regarded as a very unamiable character, had committed a petty theft, and Marie vowed vengeance. One Sunday, finding herself alone in the meadow with her little sister, Marie threw her down, and, raising her hand, said, "A little more and my knife shall enter your neck." But a fortnight later there was quite a change. Marie was all caresses and tenderness, and on a certain evening this fondness became intense. That same night little Julie disappeared, only to be found, dead and horribly mutilated, in a mill stream. Further search led to the discovery of a bloody apron of Marie's. Taxed with the crime, she confessed it, but had the meanness to attempt to inculpate a young man, who, she averred, had instigated the act, and assisted in it, from rage at the watch which the little girl kept over their movements. He was, however, luckily able to prove a perfectly satisfactory alibi. One would have supposed that if women ever merited the guillotine Marie did, but French juries have a marvelous ingenuity in discovering mitigating circumstances, and the one in this case found that the crime, notwithstanding the threats recorded, was not premeditated. So Marie only gets twenty years' hard labor.

Railways and Fox Hunting.

A few days since the Duke of Beaufort's hounds were in full-cry pursuit in the neighborhood of Mangotsfield, near Bath, when the fox crossed the line just as a train running on the Midland line, between Bath and Bristol, was approaching. The pack was close behind the fox, and they would probably have been run into, but the engine-driver stopped the train. The noble owner of the hounds, becoming aware of the fact, forwarded £3 to Mr. Martin, the Midland station master at Bath, with instructions to give the driver, William Otis, £2, and the fireman, George Orford, £1. The rewards have been handed over to the men.—London Times.

VOUDOOISM IN DETROIT.

Queer Scenes Around the Bed of a Colored Invalid.

The Detroit Free Press says there lives in Detroit a negro named Allen Tayon, whose wife has been for a long time an invalid. With him lives his mother-in-law and sister-in-law, who tell the following story:

During all of Mrs. Tayon's illness her husband failed to secure the assistance of a physician, but instead of medical treatment performed mysterious incantations at her bedside, and gave her compounds, the nature of which are known only to himself. At times, too, distorting his face and features into horrible shapes, he beat her cruelly, dragging her from her bed and throwing her upon the floor, mumbling all sorts of gibberish. Miss Stone says that whenever she and her mother attempted to interfere Tayon would assault them.

Mrs. Tayon very naturally grew worse under the treatment received, and about a week ago, when at the point of death, the services of Mrs. Drew, an old colored woman who "cures by tricks," were secured. Her appearance was bad for Tayon, because she claims to have discovered various charms in the sick room, placed there, according to her theory, by the husband to kill his wife. Among other charms were four large acorns filled with a deadly poison and placed in the four corners of the room; a large, bright needle and three pins were found in an orange which was purchased by the husband for his wife; wicked looking packages were found secreted in the bed clothing. After these revelations Mrs. Drew began her treatment, which consisted of laying on of hands, the mumbling of unintelligible prayers, and a distribution of charm satchets to the members of the family. Under Mrs. Drew's treatment the sick woman revived, and, as the neighbors say: "Wus gettin' 'long famous, and showin' right smart to git well," when Tayon discharged Mrs. Drew and turned her out of the house. Yesterday he renewed his ignorant, barbarous treatment; his wife had a relapse, and to save the woman's life the neighbors consulted, and upon their advice Miss Stone made the complaint which resulted in Tayon's arrest.

The interior of Tayon's house presented a queer picture, filled as it was with all manner of evidences of superstition, such as bunches of hair, dishes filled with ashes, bleached bones of cattle and fowls, the inevitable horseshoe, etc.

The Richest Copper Mines in the World.

[From the Cleveland Herald.]

The Calumet and Hecla Consolidated mine, seven miles northeast of Portage Lake, is now acknowledged to be the greatest copper bonanza of the world. It was discovered about ten years since by a learned pig. About a quarter of a century ago it was ascertained that the ancient mound-builders had worked copper on Lake Superior fifteen or twenty centuries since. These old mines are visible along the top range of Point Keweenaw, nearly 100 miles. A miner who had a cabin in the woods put a litter of pigs into one of the ancient pits, where he fed them until they became pork. While making himself familiar with his stock in their nest, he perceived that they had been exploring with their snouts, and had turned out a nugget of copper. The land was owned by the St. Mary's Canal Company, and was regarded as good only for timber. It was purchased as such by good financiering, after which the old works were cleared out, revealing a rich and heavy lode. Two companies were organized and two mines opened, one called the Calumet and the other the Hecla. They were not long since consolidated, and thus put under one management.

Until last year this company has not made public reports of their gains or losses, but experts saw well enough they were making a pile of money, even at the present low price of copper. According to the Ontonagon Miner, this mine has produced within the year, ending with the close of navigation, over 13,000 tons of ingot copper, being more than 1,000 tons a month. This is nearly equal to the total product of the United States at the outbreak of the rebellion. Hitherto the great Burra-Burra mine in Australia has been the banner mine of this planet. Now it is far behind the Calumet-Hecla.

In dividends or profits the latter makes the following showing: Assessments representing paid-up capital, $1,200,000; dividends, over $11,000,000; surplus, $4,000,000, besides personal and real property. Around where the pigs made their explorations in the forest is now a town of 600 families, with churches, a bank, a hotel, and a high school. There are eight shafts on the vein, occupying three-fourths of a mile, with engines for raising the mineral and the water. The deepest level is 1,000 feet, and the breadth of the vein is, on an average, twelve feet. Its course is northwest and southeast, with a plunge to the northwest of about 40 degrees.

A semi-annual dividend of $5 per share is made with the regularity of a bank. The number of shares is 40,000, the market price of which is about $170.

This mine has now reached a condition where it can regulate the price of copper in the United States, and possibly at Swansea, the metropolis of the copper-smelting world.

Another Ship Canal.

Another international ship-canal scheme is proposed. It is to connect the English Channel with the river Rhone at Lyons, so that vessels between India and England, instead of passing around the Spanish peninsula by Gibraltar, may go through this canal into the Mediterranean and thence to India via the Suez canal. The proposition is that the English and French Governments share the expense between them. France, however, could well afford to build it alone, and then impose a tonnage tax on all vessels equally.

COURT-ROOM "SASS."

Lawyers Occasionally Find Foemen Worthy of Their Steel in the Witness-Box.

A quick and ready wit is an almost indispensable endowment in a good cross-examining counsel, but the quickest and readiest sometimes finds his match. "Oh, you say this gentleman was about 55," said Canning to a pert young woman in the witness-box, "and I suppose now you consider yourself a pretty good judge of ages, eh? Ah! just so. Well, now, how old should you take me to be?"

"Judging by your appearance, sir," replied the witness, "I should take you to be about 69. By your question I should suppose you were about 16."

Whether counsel had any more questions for the lady is not recorded.

"Now," began another learned gentleman, rising slowly from among his professional brethren, and looking very profound, "now, are you prepared to swear that this mare was 8 years old?"

"Swear?" returned the stableman in the box, "yes, I'll swear she was."

"And pray, sir, upon what authority are you prepared to swear it?"

"What authority?" echoed the witness.

"Yes, sir, upon what authority? You are to give me an answer, and not repeat my question."

"I don't see as a man can be expected to answer a question before he has had time to turn it over."

"Nothing can be simpler than the question put to you. Upon what authority, I repeat, do you swear to this animal's age?"

"On very good authority."

"Then, why this evasion? Why not state it at once?"

"Well, if you must have it"—

"Must have it?" interrupted the man of law, "I will have it."

"Well, then, if you must and will have it," said the ostler, with deliberate gravity, "I had it from the mare's own mouth."

A particularly witty reply was once made by a well-known English architect, who had been giving an important opinion, and whose professional status Mr. Sergeant Garrow, the opposing counsel, was anxious to depreciate.

"You are a builder, I believe," began the Sergeant.

"No, sir, I am not a builder; I am an architect."

"Ah, well, builder or architect, architect or builder, they are pretty much the same, I suppose."

"I beg your pardon, sir; I can't admit that; I consider them to be totally different."

"Oh, indeed; perhaps you will state wherein this great difference consists?"

"An architect, sir, conceives the design, prepares the plan, draws out the specifications—in short, supplies the mind. The builder is merely the machine; the architect the power that puts the machine together and sets it going."

"Oh, very well, Mr. Architect, that will do; a very ingenious distinction without a difference. Do you happen to know who was the architect of the Tower of Babel?"

"There was no architect, sir," replied the witness, "hence the confusion there."

A Duel in the Air.

Dueling in balloons has already been tried by two Frenchmen, and with results that should commend it to duelists. MM. De Courcy and Remonin fought a duel in this wise near Paris, a few days ago, with satisfaction to both principals and seconds. The quarrel was about the famous danseuse Henriette, and, as there was some difficulty during the preliminary negotiations about selecting a spot for the encounter; somebody suggested that the fight should come off—in air! A piquant suggestion of this kind was sure to take with Frenchmen, and it was at once adopted. Nadir furnished two balloons of about 30,000 cubic feet each—that is, of a capacity of carrying three persons. When all was ready the aerostats were conveyed to a secluded spot near the capital, where they were expeditiously inflated by a secret chemical process. M. De Courcy, with his second and a physician, entered one car; M. Remonin, Gen. Nebel and a surgeon occupied the other; and preparations were made for the start. The circumstances were altogether favorable for the singular experiment. It was a delightful morning in the middle of September; the sky was cloudless; scarcely a breath of wind stirred the foliage; the affair had been so carefully concealed that nobody was present but the friends of the parties and the aeronautical assistants employed to superintend the arrangements. A brief code of signals had been devised by the seconds for the management of the aerial combat. When all was in readiness, the word to let go was given, and instantly the two aerostats shot into the air. M. De Courcy's balloon was made of blue and white spindles of silk; that of M. Remonin was white silk painted with diagonal stripes of purple and green. At the height of 1,000 feet, by barometer, while the balloons were yet very near together, the seconds exchanged rapid signals, and agreed that the conditions were favorable for the contest. "Ready!"—a pause—"Fire!"—nobody hit. "Reload and repeat—quick!" Bang! When the smoke cleared away, M. Remonin looked over the side of the car and saw his opponent's balloon rushing down with frightful rapidity. His shot had pierced the gas-bag, and the violent out-rush of gas had torn open the whole side of the fabric, and a general smash of the occupants of the car seemed inevitable. However, the bag, in suddenly loosening itself below, gathered upward in the netting like a parachute, the terrific descent of the machine was arrested, and M. De Courcy and his friends reached the earth with no further damage than a sousing in a small brook. They landed within a kilometer of the place of ascension. M. Remonin and his friends, however, were wafted in the direction of Tours, and a freshening of the wind made their atterrage somewhat more difficult and perilous. However, they managed at length to anchor, and got out of the car with nothing worse than a few bruises. The affair was the talk of Paris for a week afterward. Both principals and seconds declared themselves satisfied, and there was no renewal of hostilities. Aeronautical duels have the advantage of removing the affair from everybody's jurisdiction to a region, in fact, where writs are inoperative, and Sheriffs harmless.

THE NATIONAL DISEASE.

IS IT CURABLE?

THOSE who have suffered from the various and complicated forms of disease assumed by Catarrh, and have tried many physicians and remedies without relief or cure, await the answer to this question with considerable anxiety. And well they may; for no disease that can be mentioned is so universally prevalent and so destructive to health as Catarrh. Bronchitis, Asthma, Coughs, and serious and frequently fatal affections of the lungs follow, in many cases a case of simple but neglected Catarrh. Other sympathetic affections, such as deafness, impaired eye-sight and loss of sense of smell, may be referred to as minor but nevertheless serious results of neglected Catarrh, bad enough in themselves, but as nothing compared with the dangerous affections of the throat and lungs likely to follow.

IT CAN BE CURED.

IT can be cured. There is no doubt about it. The immediate relief afforded by SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE FOR CATARRH is but a slight evidence of what may follow a persistent use of this remedy. The hard, incrusted matter that has lodged in the nasal passages is removed with a few applications; the ulceration and inflammation subdued and healed; the entire membranous linings of the head are cleansed and purified. Constitutionally its action is that of a powerful purifying agent, destroying in its course through the system the acid poison, the destructive agent in catarrhal disease.

Each package contains Dr. Sanford's Improved Inhaling Tube, with full directions for use in all cases. Price, $1.00. For sale by all wholesale and retail druggists throughout the United States. WEEKS & POTTER, General Agents and Wholesale Druggists, Boston.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, MAR. 22, 1877

The Ligonier Banner's ticket for 1880 is: The men who were elected but counted out in 1876—Tilden and Hendricks. We are inclined to a change in the above order of the names.

Don Cameron was elected U. S. Senator in place of his father, this week and Stanley Mathews was elected to take the place of John Sherman. An abler and a better man.

Schurz compliments Zach Chandler on taking his office, and then turns round and issues an order that there shall be no assessments for political purposes. Courtesy is a great thing in this country.

Hayes evidently wants to give the Republicans the go-by and start a new party, by defering to an element in the the south. This is rather rough on the party that stole for him the very office he now holds. How sharper than a serpents tooth is an ungrateful child.

Sherman is a fine specimen of Silver service Reform. When he explains that contract business with the army of the Cumberland, during the war, by which he became a millionaire, then the people will have a basis upon which to estimate how far they can trust him with the Treasury of the Country.

The COURIER announced the death of Liberty a few weeks ago. But American Liberty shall rise again. "The eternal years of God are hers." Christ was crucified, but rose again. Liberty met the same fate in the inauguration of Hayes, and there will be another resurection.

We are happy. Hayes Civil Service Reform is complete. Gen. Lee, the silver toned General, the amorous General, the high toned General, who spoke so well, has been appointed a U. S. District Attorney. He did all he could for Hayes by lying and misrepresentation in the campaign by prostituting himself, and now Hayes rewards him. This is Silver Service Reform.

Morton wanted the glory of the appointment of Dick Thompson to a cabinet position. But when Dick called on Hayes after he was appointed, the President told him he made him Secretary of the Navy without a suggestion from any one. Morton was present, and his countenance fell in short order. The Grandson Harrison has been left out in the cold.

Garfield is the greatest hypocrit and sychophant on record. When Hayes told him that Stanley Mathews must be made Senator in place of Sherman for the great speech he made before the commission, Garfield, thereupon declines because he can be more useful in the House. He did not have a ghost of a show for Senator, and yet what a sacrifice for poor dear Garfield.

The most objectionable man in Hayes' Cabinet is John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury. His course in aiding the Louisiana Returning Board in its infamous proceedings at annuling the voice of the people has made him an object of contempt among honest men of all parties. Besides this, those who know him best seriously question his personal honesty and integrity. Upon entering public life he was comparatively a poor man; now he is a millionaire. He was shown to have been connected with several ugly jobs some years ago.

The bill passed by the Legislature for a new State House fixes the limits of cost at two millions. We are opposed to spending two millions for an edifice that can be constructed in a substantial manner, and with sufficent capacity for half that sum. Are we to indulge in extravagance in order to outrival some other extravagant State, which was impelled by the same motive? This is the people's money and does not belong to Marion county. If Indianapolis wants a fancy showy house let her contribute the additional expense to make it such. We hope the well known economic traits of character, of our Governor so providentially exercised in the late House of Representatives, will come to the rescue and prevent a wastless use of the people's hard earnings.

Of all the able, zealous, thoroughly earnest men who have been connected with the National House of Representatives for several terms past, none stood higher or more respected in the work of honest, economical government than Judge Holman. He has done more valiant service in his opposition to the passage of jobs, than a dozen other members, and he has watched the National Treasury a thousand times more close than his predecessor will ever think of doing. Mr. Holman knows more about the detailed expenditures of the government than any one else, because he has made that a study for years. His objections have saved thousands of dollars so conceded by the most partisan Republican. In the last hours of a session he has stood almost alone protesting to measures, which are generaly attempted to be passed through the hurry and confusion which attend the closing the session. Perhaps a little extreme at times in his notions of economy, yet he has been earnest and never varied from the one straight course of serving his constituents faithfully and well.

Important Legislative Acts.

As the new acts of the recent Legislature of this State will not be published for some time, we select a few of the most important which passed that have a local significance.

An act to exempt benefits, claims and interest of the wives, children and dependents of members of Masonic, Odd Fellows, and other charitable societies, and exempting certain policies of life insurance from the claims of creditors, and designating the places where such corporations shall be sued, and providing for changing the names of payees or beneficiaries as may be agreed upon by the members of such societies or incorporations and the societies or incorporations of which they are members. Approved March 2, 1877.

An act declaring in unlawful for any person, other than a passenger or an employe, to get on or off the cars while in motion, or while switching. Approved March 3, 1877.

An act autuorizing boards of county commissioners to construct gravel, macadamized or paved roads upon petition of a majority of resident land owners along and adjacent to the line of any road, authorizing them to issue bonds of the county to raise money required for that purpose, and provide for the payment of such bonds by taxing lands adjacent to the road, repealing all laws inconsistent herewith and declaring an emergency. Approved March 3, 1877.

An act to enable married women whose husbands are insane or of unsound mind to sell and convey real estate belonging to said women. Approved March 5, 1877.

An act to prevent conductors of freight trains on railroads in this State from obstructing the public highways, declaring such obstruction a misdemeanor and prescribing penalties therefor. Approved March 5, 1877.

An act to legalize the incorporation of the town of Waterloo, DeKalb county, Indiana, and the several additions thereto and the official acts of the several boards of trustees of said corporation, under an act for the incorporation of towns, defining their powers, providing for the election of the officers thereof, an declaring an emergency, approved June 11, [illegible] rules, regulations, and proceedings adopted in pursuance thereto. Approved March 6, 1877.

An act to autherize townships trustees to issue and sell bonds in certain cases for the purpose of providing funds to build school-houses in incorporated towns and townships, and providing under what condition said trustee may issue and sell such bonds, and decliring an emergancy. Approved March 7, 1877.

An act to regulate the hanging of doors to the entrances to theaters, opera-houses, public hall, museums, churches, colleges, seminaries and school buildings. Approved March 13, 1877.

Already a two million steal has been discovered in the Treasury department but Sherman is trying to hush it up. Ass't. Sec'y Conant has had something to do with the steal. We never did like the looks of that fellow, and we told him so on one occassion. We were sent down to see Mr. Bristow relative to any investigation of the Engraving and Printing Bureau. Mr. Bristow was busy and the Messenges showed us Mr. Conant's room. We told him we must see the Secretary. He replied in a very pompous manner that he thought he would do as well. We replied that when the House wanted to communicate with an assistant, it would undoubtedly seleict one whose physiognomy was not against him. "Oh your from the House, are you—the Secretary will see you, certainly," and obsequiously showed us into that officer's room. When a man can come down from imagining himself a Cabinet officer, to acting as usher, you want to give him a wide berth, because its very suspicious. And now, after many days our suspicions are confirmed.

We will also take on deposit for safekeeping valuable papers such as deeds mortgages, notes bonds, agreements etc., guardians, administrators, trustees and all other handling trust funds together with merchants; manufacturers and farmers are solicited to open an account with us. We will deal liberally with all who call.

J. H. FORD, President.
JAMES V. HAZZARD, Cashier.

Scarcity of Money.

There is no doubt but the present condition of all kinds of business and industry is fearfully depressed, and it behooved every family to look carefully to their expenses. Spring is coming on when children are liable to Croup, Whooping Cough, etc. Coughs and Colds will prevail everywhere, and Consumption, with other throat and lung diseases, will carry off many.—These diseases should not be neglected. Doctor's bills are expensive, and we would advise our people to use Boschee's German Syrup. It never has failed. One bottle at 75 cents will keep your whole family well during the winter. Two doses will relieve any case. Sold in all towns in the United States, and by your druggist F. E. Davenport.

Lost, between section 16 school house and Corunna, a plaid shawl. The finder will please leave the same at Lipsett Bros., Produce store, Corunna.

Work of Rev. J. W. Welch.

A REVIEW OF THE AUBURN CHARGE NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE OF M. E. CHURCH FOR THE LAST THREE YEARS.

Rev. J. W. Welch took charge of the M. E. Church at Auburn Ind the beginning of the conference year 1874. At that time the church edifice stood on one of the principal business streets in the city, poorly ventilated, and in a dilapidated condition. The audiences were small and generally noisy and inattentive. The spiritual condition of the membership was at a low ebb—almost gone—petty jealousies and contentions had almost ruined the orginization. Under these discouraging conditions Bro. Welch commenced his ministry. His first steps were to work up a spirit of sociability, church interest and progress. He went from house to house and by prayers and words of advice and encouragement he succeeded in healing the wounds and laying the foundation for the exalted spiritual condition the church now enjoys. By his suggestion and advice, the Ladies Aid Society purchased two lots in a retired part of the city for $1,000, paying $100 down and $200 annually. He then circulated a subscription to raise money to move the church building to the lots purchased. In this he met with bitter opposition, but he persevered and after long and arduous labor the church was moved, re-seated, painted, properly ventilated, and re-modled generally. Bro. Welch himself often assisting the workmen, and by his untireing zeal the building was finished and pronounced as good as new. He then planned an excursion from Auburn to Jackson, Mich., by which the church realized $860, which with the amount raised by subscription cleared it of debt, and the Ladies are making their payments on the lots punctually. About this time a fine Pipe Organ was purchased for the use of the choir.

During the last year he planned and superintended the erection of a Lecture Room—a commodious addition to the church which is completed and nearly free of debt. During his ministry there has been a net increase in the membership of 55 per cent, the congregations are large, orderly, and attentive, the spiritual condition of the church which was in the valley, is now on the mountain tops. The interest is not alone confined to the church but is noticeable on the streets and in the places of business. The Lord has blessed the efforts of Bro. Welch and wherever he may go he will carry with him the love and esteem of the people of Auburn. He has proved himself a wise and safe counsellor, a true friend, posessing unswerving christian integrety, firm in purpose, pure in heart, trusting in God. The church will ever hold him in grateful remembrance as being its faithful leader during the most important events in its history. Though he leaves us for other fields of labor, yet his works remain, his example survives. Our prayer is that the Lord will bless him in his new fields of labor as abundantly as he has in Auburn.

By order of the Official Board.
R McDOUGALL SEC'Y.

Tuesday afternoon thunder and lightning were the sieging features of the weather, with a fall of sleet, hail and snow.

You will make a mistake if you do not attend the great clarence sale at the New York Store J. R. Lannings old stand.

Those who like style and neatness in a suit of clothes, should not fail to visit Yesbera's store, next to Abright's, on Main street.

When Davenport went to the centennial he bought a delightful brussels carpet on his way back at Fort Wayne or New Era, we forget which.

Dr. Harter's Liver Pills are as innocent as bread, yet all powerful as the remover of sickness. They are a superior Family Pill. For sale by F. E. Davenport.

They are making arrangements already for a Soldier's Reunion at Warsaw, on the 6th of next June. The Indianian says the committee are actively at work meeting with flattering success.

These sudden changes of the weather seldom fail to bring a Cough or Cold, and we can recommend Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup as a certain cure for all diseases of the Lung and Chest. For sale by F. E. Davenport.

Our druggists all say they have never sold any medicine that gives such universal satisfaction as Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup for Coughs, Colds, etc. It has no equel. For sale by F. E. Davenport.

The agricultural society at Ft. Wayne is in debt only $16,000; and they owe us $15. Why should we toss our ready cap in the air, and sing peans to our neighbors? Ah, here is the beauty of the Sunday school work "Love thy neighbor as thy self," and we tolerate.

Dept. Sheriff Gross, took five prisoners to their new home at Michigan City last Monday. Those five just made 650 now in that popular institution. Hathaway and Casey were quite penitent, but Geo. Hobnix, the incorrigible, seemed to enjoy the trip.

We forgot to state last week that Mrs. Milt Clark, daughter of Daniel Swihart, Esq., was taken suddenly ill the Sabbath before in the Presbyterian church with something approximating appoplexy. She recovered in a short time sufficient to be able to be taken to her fathers where she is now improving.

The Garrett News says the meetings held by Elders G. Abbott and D. W. Fowler, resulted in the organization of a Christian Church in that place, numbering 25 members with prospect of quite a number more. It is proposed by this denomination to have preaching and organize a Sabbath school.

Material for making the Convex Oil Photo Miniature, for sale at Gorden's gallery. Regular customers desiring to learn how to make these beautiful pictures, can get the process (free of charge) by calling at the gallery.

We were startled the other day at the mammoth proportions of the Defiance Democrat. There is not another such a paper in the Buckeye State for rare, spicy reading, and live wideawake enterprise. The citizens stand by them in their attempts to get out a good paper and we would like to see other counties like Defiance.

Hank, your "apology" [illegible] week's Republican, is accepted with the best of grace, and might, perhaps, take your advice and "till the soil," but we must have help, and Hank, if you can and will give us positive proof that you are capable of the position of "cow-boy" your application will stand first on the list.

PETERSON.

We are glad to announce that through the prompt, energetic and attentive manner in which our genial friend Joseph Rainier, Esq., has managed the Post office here, it has been advanced from the fourth to the third class. Auburn now has the ranking Post office in the county, and comes next to Fort Wayne. We congratulate the postmaster and our citizens on this result.

Bones of a Mastodon.

Last week while John Knapp Esq., and others were taking out gravel from the State pit down the Maumee, they came upon a portion of a skeleton of what was supposed to have been a mastodon. A number of pieces of bones were secured, one of which measured one foot in diameter. The bones are a curiosity and are valuable.—Defiance Democrat.

Remember the New York Store is the only exclusive dry goods store in Auburn, and that they are selling off at cost, preparatory to bringing one of the largest stock of goods ever brought to this market. If you want to buy any thing in their line be sure and give them a call. This is no advertising dodge but a positive sale they mean just what they say.

Those who have never rested their gaze upon a festive alligator, can now be accommodated by calling at Austin's, the boot and shoe man, under the COURIER office. He has a real live genuine specimen of this tropical fruit at his store, which he captured himself in the Gulf of Mexico. We can't say that he smells of magnolia and orange blosoms, but he has evidently been in the climate where they bloom.

Now that Kahn is gone, you will want a desirable stylish suit of clothes, not made for somebody else, but for yourself. A suit of clothes made by our enterprising merchant tailor, G. H. Yesbera, will meet those conditions, and give entire satisfaction. He employs excellent workmen, and has a fine line of new spring goods just received, to select from. If you want a neat handsome suit don't fail to give him a call.

When the Courier calls upon "Freemen" to weep, many of its readers, especially in the rural districts, will think the organ is poking fun at the late Congressional candidate in this district.—Press.

That's what Baxter says of our country readers. When our readers become as ignorant of orthography as C. K., then he may imagine such a result, but until then, O, rejoice, Freemen, rejoice.

Mr. Lanning has removed his stock to Ensley's block, in the room lately occupied by Kahn & Co., clothiers. He will open out an extensive stock of Millinery, Notions and Fancy Goods. The attention he has given to the millinery trade for some time past enables him to supply the large demand in a satisfactory manner, and at the lowest price. His stock of notions, ladies furnishing and fancy goods will be largely increased and adapted to the trade.

David Kahn, Esq., the clever, genial, polite, pleasant and accomplished Israelite, who has so long and so creditably conducted a clothing establishment in this place, after passing through the hard times, and just when success was within reach, suddenly concluded to abandon the field and has shiped his goods to New Castle. Dave is enthusiastic in everything. He paid a large price for a dog, just to call him "Beefsteak." But the dog got too much of the name and died, and now Kahn leaves the town in disgust.

An exchange suggests the propriety of enacting a law to compel township trustees to publish an itemized statement of receipts and expenditures every time they settle with the county commissioners. We see no valid objection to the plan, as the expense attached thereto would be but a trifle and the people could then know what these custodians were doing with the public funds.—Banner.

Just such a law was drawn up and passed to a third reading in the Legislature, but through the inactivity of a very smart member one McMichael, who claimed to be a newspaper man, the bill failed to get a constitutional majority. This McMichael was a fraud. He came from St. Joseph and claimed to be the only editor in the House.

Blaine wanted a little credit for Morrill's appointment, but Frye says he shant have it. When politicians fall out we get an idea of the demagoguery they have used for years.

The New Store.

The large new store opposite the Auburn House, on Main street, under the energetic management of G. L. Bittinger, is shaking trade up quite lively, and is attracting a large custom by the very low prices, a great inducement these hard times. He is selling good groceries so cheap that it reminds one of anti-war prices, with sugar at 10c, coffee 24c and tea 50c; no wonder the trade is increasing. The bargains he offers in Dry Goods are correspondingly low prices, with calico at 5c, Ginghams 8c and everything else down to the lowest notch. He claims to sell cheaper than any other store in the county, and asks the people to call and have this verified. His pleasant, courteous salesmen, G. E. Bittinger and Tommy Leasure will meet you with a smile, and be glad to give you the popular prices of their extensive stock.

Railroad News.

Jay Gould has now obtained control of the Northwest and Rock Island Railroads in the interest of his Union Pacific line, and as this movement threatens a serious opposition to the Chicago Burlington and Quincy road, there has been quite a commotion in these stocks. It is also rumored that he is about to obtain control of the Erie and Canada Southern roads. At the present time trains are run to Chicago via those lines and Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. But the Canada Southern has its charter and right of way to Chicago, and only 225 miles of road have to be built to complete it. It would be a comparatively easy task to complete this gap, and then Gould could carry into effect the great object on which he is determined, namely, the control of a continuous line from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It is thought that the Canada Southern will now be built to Butler to get a temporary line to Chicago, but it is destined to keep up this connection and by the Eel River line make a St. Louis connection. This will make Auburn Junction a Division, large shops will be erected, and little doubt but that Garrett will succumb to this rival influence, and remove to the same point.

Notice to Manufacturers.

For the benefit of such men who will come here and establish manufactories, I will offer, as an inducement, ground free of cost on which to locate the buildings for said establishment, which lies immediately between the Eel River and the B. & O. Railroads, on J. Stamets addition to the town of Auburn. The following are a few manufactories, which at this time we have not got. First, no Iron Foundry, no Carriage Factory. We have no factory for the manufacture of Farming Implements, no Marble Works, no Brewery, no Paper or Oil Mills, no Cheese Factory, no Seminary or Normal School. The above institutions are badly wanted in Auburn, and to any person or persons who will establish any one of them, they will receive a deed of the ground free, but they must be responsible parties. We have an abundance of wood of all descriptions as material to work upon, and doubt if the propensities for water can be equaled in the State. We have also three railroads over which they can ship their ware. For information, address THE COURIER, or J. Stamets, Auburn, DeKalb County, Ind. J. STAMETS.

Fatal Railroad Accident.

With all the caution that should be habitually used about the railroad and especially, by its employees, yet now and then even they become victims through carlessness. Another bright young man has been horribly mangled by taking a chance, which nine times out of ten might be done safely, but this was the tenth chance and he lost. John Bell, conductor of the local freight of the Saginaw road, was coupling cars at the Junction last Tuesday morning. He gave the signal to the engineer to back up, and then attempted to pass between and get on the other side. He depended on considerable slack in the train, but there was none, and when the engine started it moved the coupling car at the same time. Just as they came together he was caught between the bumpers, the connecting pin struck him just below the small of the back and passing through to the lower part of the abdoman, crushing him terribly. As the coupling was not completed, the cars seperated again and he fell to the ground between the cars, but had presence of mind to crawl on the outside of the track, ere he was crushed by the wheels. When assistance arrived he asked for a doctor, and Dr. Spooner was sent for, who arrived shortly after, only to tell him that he must die. Under his terrible sufferings, death had no fears, and at half past eleven o'clock that night he breathed his last. His wife and child arrived on the afternoon train and when she approached his bed side he received her with open arms, and the scene was indescribably affecting. Strong men wept, and the grief of the young wife was inconsolable. He had left her in the full tide of life and health a short time before, little thinking that a short day was to bring an earthly separation. And yet even with this sad warning, others will pass on unheedingly to a similar fate. We understand he had $1,000 insurance on his life, but this will do but little to assuage the grief of the young widow, with heart bowed down with her irrepairable loss. The deceased was taken to Bankers yesterday for burial.

Better Times Coming.

We can hear a note now and then of coming prosperity. It appears a little wondering and uncertain at first, but it is growing stronger and more confident. First, the winter crops have so far escaped the danger of heavy frosts, and promises a good harvest. Next the cities are beginning to find work for the unemployed thousands, who have lived, God knows how, through the rigors of a severe winter. And now that the Presidential question is settled, though a usurper is in the chair, that incubus has been removed, and the prostration incident to the late campaign is virtually ended. An administration can do something to bring prosperity to our [illegible], but public confidence will do much more. For awhile our free institutions were in danger, but by the magnanimity of the Democratic party, that was averted. Having reach the turning point of the hard times brought on by Radical extravagance and corruption, and the people having demanded a change in the manner of things, we may now reasonably hope that by the industry and energy of the farmer and mechanic and good promises for the capitalist, better times are coming. From various sections of the country, we hear that iron mills, woolen mills, cotton and print mill, implement factories, etc., are all resuming business again, or preparing to do so. This shows that all the industrial classes have confidence in the future.

Another note is the large increase of exportations over importations. When we sell more as a nation than we buy abroad, it is very plain that we are getting better off. This very fact is contributing largely to a restoration of confidence. For a year or over we have constantly gained on our balance of trade. The exports of provisions from the principal ports of this country from November 1st, 1876, to February 10th, 1877, show an aggregate increase of about 100,000,000 pounds, compared with the corresponding period of last season.

The plain duty of all is to do our part toward prosperity. Confidence is superinduced by earnest work. This is the line for successfull efforts at prosperity, and if all classes follow it, the country will be on the high road to better terms by next September.

Good Advice.

Now is the time of year for Pneumonia, Lung Fever, &c. Every family should have a bottle of BOSCHEE'S GERMAN SYRUP. Don't allow for one moment that cough to take hold of your child, your family or yourself. Consumption, Asthma, Pneumonia, Croup, Hemmorrhages and other fatal diseases may set in. Although it is true GERMAN SYRUP is curing thousands of these dreaded diseases, yet it is much better to have it at hand when three doses will cure you. One bottle will last your family a winter and keep you safe from danger. If you are consumptive, do not rest until you have tried this remedy. Sample bottle 10 cents. Regular size 75 cents. NEIGHBORHOOD NEWS.

CORUNNA.

Here on the heights we are "snowed under," snow having fallen to the depth of two feet on the level during the storm of Friday and Saturday last. Trains on the Air Line were necessarily delayed for a period of twenty-four hours, but on Monday afternoon were running on time.

We learn of another "smash up" down the road, without the loss of life or injury to persons. At the bridge spanning Bear Creek, near Stryker, Ohio, on last Friday morning a through freight train run into an eastern bound stock Express train. Two hours behind time, the Express had taken water at the tank just across the bridge, and was moving at the rate of seven miles an hour, when she was telescoped by No. 84, striking her caboose while about half way across the the bridge. The collision set fire to the caboose, the bridge also took fire, and the locomotive of No. 84 was badly wrecked. Three car loads of stock cattle were distroyed. Bear Creek Bridge was of wooden structure, and 175 feet span. This happened on last Friday, a few hours less than one week from the accident at this place. A double Black Friday for the Lake Shore.

In speaking of the late accident on the Air Line near Corunna, the Garrett News says: "The cause of the accident was that the conductor of the freight train thought he could make Sedan before the Express came along.

"Go abroad to get the news." The cause of the accident was no such thing. The conductor had orders to make Sedan and there side track for the passenger, and gave such order to his engineer, but the engineer disobeyed and pulled out for Corunna where the collision occurred. In justice to one of the oldest most competent conductors on the road, will the News correct the eroneous statement?

The grain market opened out Saturday with the following quotations: Wheat, amber No. 1 $1.40; No. 2 do., $1.25; No. 1 white, $1.45; No. 2, do, $1.30. On Monday and Tuesday advanced one cent and the receipts had increased over Saturday. Oats and Corn were dull, the former averaging 35c, and the latter 45c., white oats worth 38c. Clover seed dull at $8.00 Potatoes $1.10. Butter 15c. Eggs, 10c, Stock Hogs, live weight, 3½@4c., dressed, 5@5½c. Hides green, 5c.

Levi Brown, Jr., and Mr. Spangler will emigrate to Arkansas on the 2nd of next month, having already purchased land for a homestead in the south-western part of the State. The following named gentlemen citizens of Corunna propose locating there next fall. Messers, E. and A. Johnson Levi Brown, Sen., Hank Calkin, Verne Rowdell, John Powlus, and H. DeVore.

J. C. Bowman and family of New Bedford, Ohio enroute for the west, spent last Sabbath with their friends, Mr. R. H. Sherlock and family, north of town.

Mrs. Sherlock, of Holmes county, Ohio, mother of R. H. and E. W. Sherlock, is visiting with her sons near Corunna.

Mrs. Delong, relict of the late James Delong, is lying very low with paralysis at the residence of her son east of town.

J. T. Adams of Findley Ohio, brother of W. B., was in town last Thursday.

LOVELAND.

CEDAR CREEK.

I desire to reply to an item of March 8th, of A. J. W. I could not at first imagine who A. J. W. was, but finally I thought of a very old man, who, according to his own history, must be between one and two hundred years old, and therefore somewhat childish. He has followed every occupation, from livery boy up to preaching, if he tells the truth, and I give him that credit. I don't know whether he had license when we heard him preach, but if not he will get them under the new eldership. If he so desires I will give his history as far back as I remember. I understand the minister helped to write the item, charging that the "servants of the devil falsly attack the ministry." Come let us reason together. Who attacked Mr. McCaully and others and made bitter remarks? Do you believe in the old saying love your neighbors and hate your enemies? But the Great Master says love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you. Look at Jesus, see him as he stood upon the Mount before the great city of Jerusalem, with all the magnificence and grandeur spread out before him. There his bitter enemies were congregated. There he had been persecuted and maltreated. There were the hands that soon would sieze him and bear him away to ignominious death. How did he feel toward them. Did he say they were servents of the devil, or did he say the door of mercy was closed against them; did he hurl back bolts of vengence at them with wrath and bitterness? Nay, he pleaded for mercy. Again look at him on the cross: he is nailed to the tree and the blood streams from his feet, an angry mob wag their heads and mock him. But his was a spirit of kindness, which could not be overcome with evil, and when they gave him vinegar and gall for drink, even in the agonies of death he lifted his voice and prayed for his murderers. Oh, ye who throw your wrath at one another, look here and learn mercy and see the spirit of the Gospel of Christ. Now let not your angry passions rise, but let your light so shine before men that they may see your good.

THE NEWS CONDENSED.

THE EAST.

The United States District Court Grand Jury has found three indictments against John C. Tracy, President of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Hartford, Vt., for misapplying $50,000 of the funds of the bank, and five indictments against J. L. Chapman, cashier, for assisting the President, and for embezzlement and perjury.... One night last week the five-story brick building, 339 to 347 Washington street, New York, occupied by Henry Welsh, wholesale grocer, fell. Loss, $60,000.... Oliver Ames, of Boston, brother of the late Oakes Ames, and Director of the Union Pacific railroad, died recently.

The Exchange Bank of Canandaigua, N. Y., has failed. Liabilities, $140,000 to $200,000; assets, not over $70,000 to $100,000.... By the burning of a tenement house in New York city, a few evenings ago, four children lost their lives—two by burning and two by suffocation.

The contest over the will of the late Commodore Vanderbilt has been ended by all the contestants withdrawing their objections to the probate of the will. The trial was to have commenced last week, but the whole matter was arranged between William H. Vanderbilt and the contestants. Among the counsel were Secretary of State Evarts, Judge Matthews, Jeremiah S. Black and David Dudley Field—all of counsel in the late Presidential contest.... The German Banking Company of Pottsville, Pa., has collapsed.

A bill before the New York Legislature provides that fares on palace and sleeping-cars shall not be over 35 cents for 100 miles.

The Medical College of Pennsylvania has just conferred the degree of Doctor of Medicine on fifteen women.... The store of Fielder Magruder, at Benning's Station near Washington city, was burned the other day, and Ebenezer Large and his son John, who slept in the building, were burned. There is but little doubt that both of the men were murdered, the store robbed, and then set on fire.

THE WEST.

The second trial of Alexander Sullivan, of Chicago, for the killing of Francis Hanford, last July, terminated in a verdict of acquittal. It will be remembered that on the first trial the jury disagreed.... Caleb Ives, of New York, interested in lumber and pork packing operations, failed one day last week for about $250,000. He estimates his assets at about the same sum.... The Farmers' and Merchants' Bank, of Mattoon, Ill., was recently put into bankruptcy by its creditors, chiefly depositors.

Advices from Western Kansas give an account of a fight between Dr. Tichenor and a band of Indians, some days ago, at a point called "The Cave," in Ness county, Kan. The Indians attacked the cabin in which the Doctor was sleeping, but before they could enter he securely fastened the door, and from a loop-hole killed the chief of the band and three others. The Indians then withdrew, and Tichenor, thinking they had gone, started for the settlements, but was fired upon from ambush and severely wounded. He escaped, however, and after sixteen hours' hard travel reached the settlement.

The Executive Committee of the Wisconsin State Agricultural society has decided to hold the State Fair of 1877 in Janesville.

A horrible tragedy was recently enacted near Huntington, Ind. Michael Merriman, who has been in an insane asylum and was sent home about a year ago thought to have been permanently cured, shot one of his sons, aged 18, through the head, fatally wounding him, and another, aged 16, through the shoulder, probably fatally wounding him. He then shot and killed himself instantly.... The snow in the mountains of Utah is unusually deep, and several people have lately been killed by snow-slides.

The work of the Wisconsin State Legislature, during its recent eight weeks' session, is found in 716 bills introduced in both houses, of which 301 failed to become laws. The number of bills passed is 113 less than those that matured last year. About one-third of those that passed at this session were amendments to existing statutes. For the various State institutions, and for other purposes, appropriations were made amounting to $371,500.

A compulsory educational law passed the Ohio Legislature and received the signature of the Governor.... The Colorado Legislature has abolished the grand-jury system in that State, providing in lieu thereof that the Judge of the County Court and two Justices of the Peace of the county shall sit as a court of indictment to hear testimony on both sides of any case brought before them. In indictments under the grand-jury system, the testimony of the prosecution only is received.... Six Chinamen, employed in clearing land near Chico, Butte county, Cal., were attacked in their cabin by a band of whites. Three were shot dead, and a fourth died soon after, the fifth being beyond hope of recovery. The sixth, who was slightly wounded, escaped by feigning death.... Stephen S. Jones, editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, the organ of the Spiritualists in Chicago, was recently shot and killed by Prof. William C. Pike, a phrenologist of that city. A woman (Pike's wife) was at the bottom of the trouble.

WASHINGTON.

Mrs. Hayes, the other day, received a beautiful bouquet of rosebuds and violets, accompanied with a card bearing the words, "From a Mississippi Republican who stands by the statesman who has said that he who best serves his country serves his party best.".... Col. Ward H. Lamon, Mr. Lincoln's old law partner, is an applicant for the Mexican mission.... Alexander H. Stephens has addressed a letter to the President urging the appointment of Herschel V. Johnson, of Georgia, to the vacancy on the Supreme bench created by the resignation of Judge Davis.

All the new members of the Cabinet, with the exception of Secretary Thompson, who had not arrived, proceeded to the White House on the 12th inst. and took the oath of office, which was administered by Chief Justice Cartter, of the District Supreme Court. The oath was administered to all in a body, with the exception of Postmaster General Key, who could not take the iron-clad oath, but took the modified oath. After the members had interchanged congratulations, they left the White House and took charge of their respective departments.... A Washington dispatch says "there is the best reason for believing that Hon. Carl Schurz will not remain in the Cabinet many months, but will resign to accept a foreign mission as soon as he has enjoyed for a short time the honors of a Cabinet position."

Appointments by the President: Frederick W. Seward, to be Assistant Secretary of State; Lot M. Morrill, Collector of Customs for the District of Portland and Falmouth, Me.; Wm. Stone, United States Attorney for South Carolina; Asa O. Aldis, of Vermont, James B. Howell, of Iowa, Orange Ferris, of New York, Southern Claims Commissioners. Postmasters—Wm. R. Holloway, at Indianapolis; Nicholas Filbeck, at Terre Haute; George Pfleger, at South Bend.

Hon. John J. Knox has been re-appointed Comptroller of the Currency.... Ex-Gov. Osborne, of Kansas, is an applicant for the mission to Chili.... Rumor has Gen. Logan booked for the Brazil Mission.... Miss Ada Sweet will be retained as Pension Agent at Chicago.... Hon. J. M. Tyner, late Postmaster General, has been appointed First Assistant Postmaster General under Mr. Key.... Fred Douglass has been appointed United States Marshal for the District of Columbia; Reuben H. Stephenson, Surveyor of Customs at Cincinnati; and Archibald M. Hughes United States Attorney for the Middle District of Tennessee.

Mr. Pinchback, in an interview with the President, is quoted by a Washington correspondent as having said that justice to whites and mercy to blacks alike protested against the recognition of the Packard Government. The President is said to have replied that he would soon open a clear way to peace in Louisiana and contentment to the people of that State.... The Secretary of the Treasury has just issued the forty-third call for $10,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds to be redeemed or funded in the 4½ per cents. The frequency of these calls and the rapidity with which the funding process goes forward is a gratifying evidence of the popularity of United States Government securities as a channel for the investment of European capital.... Secretary of the Interior Schurz has notified all heads of bureaus of the Interior Department that during his administration of its affairs there will be no removals of clerks or other employes, except "for cause," and no promotions, except "for merit." It will, therefore, be useless for [illegible] to file papers soliciting clerical appointments or promotions on merely personal or political grounds.... Secretary of State Evarts, in an informal conversation the other day with Lorenz Brentano, of Chicago, made a declaration which will be received with great satisfaction by the entire German-American population. He stated that it would not be the policy of the State Department hereafter to refuse to appoint naturalized German citizens, or foreign-born citizens of any kind as diplomatic and consular officers to the country of their birth. Such a policy was adopted by Secretary Fish in 1873, and has given immeasurable dissatisfaction to naturalized citizens. Mr. Evarts says he will not follow Mr. Fish's policy, but will treat all American citizens alike, irrespective of the place of their birth.... Secretary of the Navy Thompson has notified all the bureau officers that no contracts are to be signed hereafter without his approval; and that meetings of bureau officials will be held regularly two or three times a week, at which all matters pertaining to the service are to be presented for decision.

THE SOUTH.

A Raleigh (N. C.) dispatch announces the appointment of a commission, under sanction of the Legislature, to report a plan for the settlement of the State debt acceptable to the bondholders and not too burdensome, to be agreed to by the people of the State.... A terrible fight occurred, a few days ago, in Madison county, Tenn. Deputy Sheriff Fussell, and William and John Anderson, his nephews, went to the house of one Potete for the purpose of arresting three of his sons, who had been indicted for carrying concealed weapons. The father of the Potetes resisted, and killed Fussell, and slightly wounded William Anderson, who mortally wounded John Potete, who died soon after the fight. Andy Potete was arrested and committed to jail, but his other sons escaped, after robbing the body of Fussell and taking his horse.... The Nicholls Legislature at New Orleans has adopted resolutions warmly approving the Southern policy of President Hayes' administration, and pledging earnest co-operation with the effort to restore confidence and fraternal relations among the people, and to secure protection to life and liberty in Louisiana.

The question of the conflicting claims of Hampton and Chamberlain to the Governorship of South Carolina came up in the Circuit Court at Charleston, on the 13th inst., as involving the invalidity of a commitment by a Trial Justice appointed by Hampton. Judge Reed decided that the authority of the Trial Justice must be respected as that of a de facto and de jure officer of State. This decision establishes the legality of the Hampton Government as to the Charleston Circuit. The other Circuit Judges throughout the State have already made similar decisions.

H. J. Bell, Democratic nominee, has been elected to Congress from the Ninth Georgia District, to succeed Benj. H. Hill.... Madame Octavia Walton Le Vert, so well known to people of the two hemispheres, died last week, near Augusta, Ga., her native State.

President Hayes has made the following Federal appointments:

Hon. George S. Boutwell, to be a Commissioner to prepare a new edition of the Revised Statutes.

John H. McFarland, Receiver of Public Moneys at Detroit, Mich.

Jesse H. Moore, Pension Agent at Springfield, Ill.

John C. Lee, United States Attorney for the Northern District of Ohio.

John S. Owens, Register of the Land Office at Taylor's Falls, Minn.

Charles B. Tyler, Register of Lands at New Ulm, Minn.

POLITICAL.

The following telegram was received by Senator Bayard, on the 9th:

SHREVEPORT, La., March 9.

The Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Packard's dispatch yesterday to Senator Blaine, that in every parish outside of New Orleans, except what he terms the five bulldozed parishes, his Government is recognized by all except a few Nicholls officials, is untrue. The people of this parish and the surrounding parishes spurn Packard's pretensions and render hearty allegiance to Gov. Nicholls. The Republican police jury of this parish has, by a formal resolution, recognized the Nicholls Government.

Signed by Nathan Gregg, President Shreveport Cotton Exchange; Samuel C. Head, President police jury, Caddo parish; N. C. Blanchard, President Democratic Committee, Caddo parish; D. M. Johnson, banker.

The following letters are made public by Gov. Chamberlain, at the special request of Stanley Matthews, and are the letters alluded to by Mr. Blaine, in the Senate on the 7th inst.:

WASHINGTON, March 6, 1877.

The Hon. D. H. Chamberlain, Columbia, S. C.:

My Dear Sir: I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with you, but have learned to respect you from the knowledge of your reputation. I take the liberty of addressing you now with great distrust of the propriety of doing so, prefacing it by saying that I speak without authority from any one, and represent only my own views. The situation of public affairs in South Carolina is too complicated to be discussed at length in a note, and yet impresses me as one that ought to be changed by the policy of Republican statesmen in such a way as not only to remove all controversies that disturb that State, but to remove all embarrassments arising from it to the party in other parts of the country. It has occurred to me to suggest whether by your own concurrence and co-operation an accommodation could not be arrived at which would obviate the necessity for the use of Federal arms to support either Government, and leave that to stand which was the best able to stand of itself. Such a course would relieve the administration from the necessity, so far as executive action is concerned, of making any decision between the conflicting Governments, and would place you in the position of making the sacrifice of what you deemed your abstract rights for the sake of the peace of the community, which would entitle you to the gratitude not only of your own party, but the respect and esteem of the entire country. I trust you will pardon the liberty I have taken, as my motive is to promote not only the public but your own personal good. With great respect, STANLEY MATTHEWS.

Appended to the foregoing are the following lines by Evarts:

Dear Governor: I have read this letter and conversed with Col. Haskell and Senator Gordon on this subject, so interesting to us all. I should be very glad to aid in the solution of the difficulties of the situation, and especially to hear from you speedily. With my compliments to Mrs. Chamberlain, yours very truly, WILLIAM M. EVARTS.

Washington political on dits: Gen. A. E. Merritt, of New York, a prominent Liberal, and former Naval Officer of that port, is to be appointed Surveyor of New York.—Ex-Senator Fenton is spoken of for a foreign mission, as are Gens. Logan and Hawley. The name of Gen. Logan is suggested for the mission of Madrid or St. Petersburg. Gen. Sickles is also an aspirant again for a foreign mission. If Pierrepont does not remain in England, Frelinghuysen will be strongly urged for the position.—Ex-Congressman Wilshire, of Arkansas, a Union soldier and Democrat, a native of Illinois, will be recommended for the Commissionership of Indian Affairs.—The friends of Judge Wood, United States Judge of the Southern Circuit, will urge him for appointment to the vacancy upon the Supreme bench caused by the resignation Justice Davis. If the appointment should be made from the Southern Circuit, Justice Bradley, who has done circuit duty in the South, will probably be assigned to the circuit vacated by Justice Davis.—Senator Cameron, of Pennsylvania, has resigned his seat in the Senate.

Ex-Secretary of War J. Donald Cameron was, on the 13th inst., unanimously nominated by the Republican caucus of the Pennsylvania Legislature to the United States Senatorship, vacated by his father, Simon Cameron.

It appears that Hon. Stanley Matthews addressed a letter to Gov. Packard, of Louisiana, similar to the one sent to Gov. Chamberlain, of South Carolina, urging him to abdicate his claims to the Governorship in favor of Nicholls. Packard has just replied to Matthews. In the course of his letter he says: "I received a majority of the legal votes cast at the last election, have been declared Governor by the Legislature in joint session with an undisputed quorum in both houses, and having been lawfully vested with authority as Governor I cannot with due regard to my oath of office and duty to the [illegible] voters who have elected me to the Chief Magistracy, though I should receive consideration and position in some appropriate way, abandon those faithful men to the merciless vengeance of the White-League Democracy.".... A large delegation of colored men, representing a number of States, called on the President the other day, and urged him to appoint Prof. John M. Langston, of Washington, Commissioner of Agriculture. The President informed them that it was his intention to appoint Prof. Langston and Fred Douglass to important and responsible positions at an early day, but he had not yet decided as to the place that would be given the former.... Postmaster General Key, finding himself overwhelmed nearly with applications for office, has caused the following circular to be prepared for transmission to every applicant as the only answer that can possibly be given at present to any of the constantly accumulating letters:

POSTOFFICE DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, ——.

Sir: Your letter of the —— has been received and placed upon the files of the department for consideration under the rules of the civil service when vacancies occur. At present none exist.

D. M. KEY, Postmaster General.

A delegation of Illinois Republicans called on the President the other day, to request the removal of the Postmaster at Springfield, in order to give place to Mr. Phillips, the defeated Republican candidate for Congress, and editor of the Illinois State Journal. The President asked if they had any charges to prefer against the present Postmaster. The reply was "No, but he is a sort of a half-way Democrat, and Mr. Phillips, having been defeated for Congress, is entitled to consideration at the hands of the party." The President declined to take the action requested, saying that he would not remove, except for cause, whereupon the delegation retired very much disgusted.

The Republican members of the Ohio Legislature met in caucus on the 15th inst., for the purpose of nominating a candidate for United States Senator. The first ballot resulted: Stanley Matthews, 29; W. P. Howland, 30; Alphonso Taft, 7; Samuel Shellabarger, 7; William Lawrence, 3. On the third ballot Mr. Matthews received 43 votes, three more than necessary, and was declared the nominee.

GENERAL.

The Western Union Telegraph Company announces that hereafter there shall be no rate higher than $1 for ten words between any of its offices in the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, District of Columbia, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin; St. Louis, in Missouri; Louisville and Covington, in Kentucky; Alexandria, in Virginia, and all points in Michigan excepting those north of the Straits of Mackinac. This order will work very material reduction in the rates for long distances between a vast number of points.

The amount of grain in sight in the United States and Canadas is as follows: Wheat, 10,779,145 bushels; corn, 12,208,880 bushels; oats, 2,902,142 bushels; barley, 3,478,162 bushels.

James Kingan, the crooked New York produce speculator, who recently fled from the city after swindling everybody with whom he had dealings, was found dead the other day, on the track of the Inter-Colonial railway, in New Brunswick. One theory is that he was murdered for the money which he carried; another, that he was laboring under mental aberration and committed suicide. Eight thousand dollars was found in the pistol-pocket of the dead man.... A plan for the adjustment of the Southern State debts has been matured by the committee appointed for that purpose some time ago by the capitalists of New York. The plan recommended has reference to the Tennessee debt—the New York committee having had a conference with the committee appointed by the Tennessee Legislature—and contemplates the issue of new bonds at the rate of 60 per cent. of the aggregate amount of the principal and unpaid interest up to July, 1877, the new bonds to be payable in thirty years, and bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. payable semi-annually in New York—the interest-coupons to be receivable for all taxes due to the State of Tennessee.... An express robbery was committed at Pittsburgh, Pa., the other evening, which for ingenuity and audacity has rarely been surpassed in the annals of criminal exploits. In this case the telegraph took the place of the revolver, and electricity served instead of bloodshed. The telegraph wire was tapped outside the city, and, by the aid of a pocket instrument, two bogus messages were sent, by which the express messenger turned over his car to the thief under what he had every reason to suppose were genuine instructions to that effect from the General Superintendent at Pittsburgh. The clever rascals who managed the job realized about $4,000 for their pains, and the Express Company are wondering what new and unsuspected plan of robbery will next be attempted.

FOREIGN.

An Egyptian man-of-war, which was cruising in the gulf of Suez to break up the slave traffic, took fire at sea and was entirely destroyed. There were 420 men on board, of whom 400 were saved—the Europeans.... A Calcutta dispatch says: "Full reports from local officials on the recent cyclone show that the total loss of life was really less than half of Sir Richard Temple's first hurried estimate of 205,000.".... It is said that a motion, in the lower house of the French Congress, to amplify the fortifications of Paris, was incontinently smothered upon peremptory information from the German Government that such action, if carried out, would be construed into cause for another war between the two nations.

The Constantinople correspondent of the London Times says: "Under former Sultans there were instances of tyrannical, improvident, and rapacious government, but under Sultan Abdu Hamid we are in full anarchy—the palace issuing orders without consulting the Porte, and the Porte transacting business without guidance from or communication with the palace. Such a combination of tyranny with anarchy, of absolutism with impotence, the world has never witnessed."

The winter in Northern Russia is declared to have been the coldest for many years.... A London dispatch says the rinderpest has appeared near Grimsby, Lincolnshire, and the foot and mouth disease in Cheshire, Somersetshire, and Flintshire.... Mr. Gladstone has published a pamphlet, in which he shows that the real conduct of the Porte toward the authors of the Bulgarian outrages is a distinct encouragement to a repetition of the horrors. The guilt of the Turkish Government is fully proved. United Europe should at least impose such restraints upon the Turkish Administration as all Europe has declared indispensable. The proposal to grant to Turkey a year of grace simply means another year of debasement and misery for Turkish subjects. Gladstone concludes: "I ask England to redeem the pledges given by the Crimean war to the subjects of Turkey.".... A Vienna correspondent of the London News reports that a body of Persians have devastated part of the province of Bagdad, and carried off 40,000 sheep.... Stanley, writing to the London Daily Telegraph from Ujiji Aug. 12, 1876, announces that he has completely surveyed Lake Tanganyika.

The Colorado potato-beetle has been discovered alive at Bremen, on goods brought from New York.... Peace has been concluded between the Transvaal Republic and Secocoeni.

Preparations are making in Edinburgh, Scotland, for the approaching meeting in July of the Pan-Presbyterian Council. Delegates will be in attendance from America and from the British colonies, and it is expected that the session will prove an important one in its results.... The commission appointed by the French Academy of Sciences to investigate in regard to the phylloxera (insect) report that twenty-five departments have been ravaged, and in many districts poverty, privation and misery have replaced affluence. In consequence of the destruction of the vine-culture the traffic on railways and canals has diminished, and the public taxes do not yield enough to pay for collection.

The news from the Mexican capital is to the effect that "the Senate has been ignored by [illegible] Government, who have declared that the law creating the Senate was forced by Lerdo appointing his friends. Diaz, however, promises to observe the constitution when not too inconvenient. United States Minister Foster recognizes Diaz as President de facto, but will not formally recognize him as President de jure until after the meeting of Congress and his inauguration.".... A Constantinople dispatch of the 16th inst. says: "Great agitation prevails. The recall of Midhat Pasha and war with Russia seem dominant among the confused demands of the populace. Grave complications are apprehended.".... A Berlin dispatch announces that the Sultan has proclaimed a general amnesty in Bulgaria.... The English answer to Russia's proposals is expected to occasion further negotiations of a friendly and pacificatory character.

CONGRESS.

Extra Session of the Senate.

Friday, March 9.—Senate.—After the reading of the journal, Mr. Sargent submitted a resolution that the Senate appoint the standing and other committees. It was agreed to. He also submitted a resolution to suspend rule 46, requiring the appointment of committees to be made by ballot, and it was agreed to. The committees were then announced, the following being a list of the Chairmen: Privileges and Elections, Morton; Foreign Relations, Cameron; Finance, Morrill; Appropriations, Windom; Commerce, Conkling; Manufactures, Booth; Agriculture, Paddock; Military Affairs, Spencer; Naval Affairs, Sargent; Judiciary, Edmunds; Postoffices and Post Roads, Hamlin; Public Lands, Oglesby; Private Land Claims, Thurman; Indian Affairs, Allison; Pensions, Ingalls; Revolutionary Claims, Johnston; Claims, McMillan; District of Columbia, Dorsey; Patents, Wadleigh; Public Buildings and Grounds, Dawes; Territories, Patterson; Railroads, Mitchell; Mines and Mining, Sharon; Revision of Laws, Christiancy; Education and Labor, Burnside; Civil Service and Retrenchment, Blaine; To Audit and Control the Contingent Expense of the Senate, Jones, of Nevada; Printing, Anthony; Library, Howe; Rules, Ferry; Engrossed Bills, Bayard; Enrolled Bills, Conover; Levees of the Mississippi River, Bruce; To Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, Chaffee; Transportation Rates to the Seaboard, Cameron, of Wisconsin.... Mr. Thurman called up the resolution submitted by him yesterday, to refer the credentials of J. B. Eustis, claiming a seat from Louisiana, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Agreed to without a division.... Mr. Grover submitted a resolution for the submission of the petitions from 369 of the people of Oregon in regard to his admission as a Senator to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with power to send for persons and papers. The petitions recite that it was currently reported and generally believed that the election of L. F. Grover as Senator of the United States was procured by bribery, corruption and other unlawful means in the Legislature of the State of Oregon; and that said L. F. Grover did corruptly and fraudulently issue a certificate of election to one E. A. Cronin as Presidential elector on Dec. 6, 1876; and that said L. F. Grover did bear false witness before the committee on or about Jan. 6, 1877. Agreed to.... The Senate then went into executive session, and, when the doors were reopened, adjourned until to-morrow.

Executive Session.—The executive session of the Senate lasted about twenty minutes. The Cabinet nominations were referred to committees as follows: That of Schurz to the Committee on Finance; Devens to the Judiciary Committee; McCrary to the Committee on Military Affairs; Thompson to the Naval Affairs Committee, and Key to the Committee on Postoffices and Postroads. A brief discussion took place upon adjourning until Monday, which was negatived.

Saturday, March 10.—The Cabinet nominations of President Hayes were all confirmed in executive session. There were aye and no votes taken upon Messrs. Schurz and Evarts. Upon these two some Republicans did not vote at all. Mr. Schurz received the highest number of votes, some 48. All of the Democrats except Messrs. Thurman and Eaton voted for Mr. Schurz. They voted in the negative from the principle of opposing all of Hayes' appointments. Mr. Blaine did not vote. Upon an aye and no vote, Mr. Key received 45 votes, with Messrs. Thurman and Eaton in the negative. Mr. Evarts received about 50 votes. Messrs. McCrary, Devens and Thompson were confirmed without a recorded vote being taken, so near as could be ascertained, unanimously.

Tuesday, March 13.—Senate.—Mr. Anthony submitted a resolution that the volume containing the proceedings of the Electoral Commission and of the two houses of Congress in regard to counting the electoral vote be prepared for publication under the direction of the Committee on Printing, and that 200 copies be furnished to the Justices of the Supreme Court who were members of the Electoral Commission. Referred.... Mr. Morton submitted an order that the telegraphic dispatches referred to in the letter of William Orton, President of the Western Union Telegraph Company, read on Saturday last, be deposited in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, to be by him delivered to Mr. Orton upon his giving a receipt for the same. Laid over.... The Senate then went into executive session, and soon after adjourned.

Wednesday, March 14.—A committee, consisting of Messrs. Anthony and Whyte, was appointed to wait upon the President and inform him that the Senate was ready to adjourn unless he had some further communications to make. The committee performed the duty assigned to it, and was informed by the President that he would desire to communicate with the Senate further before the final adjournment took place.... The telegraphic dispatches examined by the Committee on Privileges and Elections during the investigation as to the Oregon electors were ordered to be restored to the Western Union Telegraph Company.... A resolution was laid over, authorizing the sub-Committee on Privileges and Elections to sit during vacation and investigate the charges preferred against Senator Grover.... The Senate then went into executive session.

Thursday, March 15.—Provision was made for printing the volume containing the proceedings of the Electoral Commission and the two houses of Congress relating thereto, and the matter of investigating the charges against Senator Grover was laid over till to-morrow, after which the Senate went into executive session.... In executive session the Senate confirmed George S. Boutwell Commissioner for the purpose of preparing and publishing a new edition of the first volume of Revised Statutes; Registers of Land Offices, John S. Owens, Taylor's Falls, Minn., and Charles B. Tyler, New Ulm; Surveyor of Customs, Reuben H. Stephenson, Cincinnati.

The Big Horn Country.

The war of Crook, Terry and Sitting Bull is not wholly without compensation. War is an explorer, and often brings to the notice of the world areas of which it before knew nothing. Many of the movements of the late Indian campaign were in the vicinity of the Big Horn mountains, of a portion of which a correspondent of the Pacific Engineer thus writes:

An immense belt of mountains completes a circle around one of the most beautiful and fertile valleys, or chains of valleys, to be found in all the grand, wild West. Taking the tier of water-courses tributary to the Big Horn river, above where that stream disembogues itself from the canyon of the Big Horn mountains, and within the scope of the mind's vision, we behold a territory as large as all of the settled portion of Colorado; with a greater part of its surface resting at a lower altitude than the upper parts of the Arkansas and Platte valleys; possessing wondrous alluvial valleys of marked fertility; clothed to the very summits of the inner terrace of mountains with that peculiar bunch grass known nowhere else outside of the neighboring borders of Montana, and within the bosom of the other four terraces of mountains are imbedded the native wealth on which the industry of the human creation is based.

This region is as yet but little known. That it possesses auriferous deposits is beyond a doubt, but in how great quantities is not known. It is entirely within the limits of possibility that it contains more gold than once was contained in all California. That it has other mineral wealth is pretty well established, only, as in the case of gold, the extent of its mineral deposits is wholly unknown. It almost takes one's breath away as he reflects upon the magnitude and value of the areas belonging to this country which are yet comparatively unknown, not at all settled, and which must be, in time, opened up and become an inhabited portion of the Union. In the Big Horn country there is room for the location and support of a half dozen nations such as now have an independent existence in the old world.—Chicago Times.

THE ASHTABULA ACCIDENT.

Verdict of the Coroner's Jury who Have Been Investigating the Causes of the Horrible Occurrence.

Below will be found the verdict of the Coroner's jury as to the cause and responsibility for the accident:

That the fall of the bridge was the result of defects and errors made in designing, constructing and erecting it; that a great defect, and one which appears in many parts of the structure, was the dependence of every member for its efficient action upon the probability that all or nearly all the others would retain their position and do the duty for which they were designed, instead of giving to each member a positive connection with the rest, which nothing but a direct rupture could sever. The members of each truss were, instead of being fastened together, rested one upon the other, as illustrated by the following particulars: The deficient cross-section of portions of the "T" chords and some of the main braces, and the insufficient strength and bad arrangement of both the horizontal and vertical transverse bracing in the construction of the angle blocks, as finally modified, without sufficient lugs or flanges to keep the ends of the main and counter braces from slipping out of place; in the construction of the packing and yokes used in binding together the main and counter braces at the points where they crossed each other; in the shimming of the top chords to compensate the deficient length of some of their members; in the placing during the process of erection of thick beams where the plan required thin ones and thin ones where it required thick ones. That the railway company used and continued to use this bridge for about eleven years, during all of which time a careful inspection by a competent bridge engineer could not have failed to discover all the defects. For the neglect of such careful inspection the railway company is alone responsible; that the responsibility of this fearful disaster and its consequent loss of life rests upon the railway company, which, by its chief executive officer, planned and erected this bridge; that the cars in which the deceased passengers were carried into the chasm were not heated by heating apparatus so constructed that the fire in them will be immediately extinguished whenever the cars are thrown from the track and overturned; that their failure to comply with the plain requirements of the law places the responsibility of the origin of the fire upon the railroad company (see act of May 14, 1869); that the responsibility for not putting out the fire at the time it first made its appearance in the wreck rests upon those who were the first to arrive at the scene of the disaster, and who seemed to have been so overwhelmed by the fearful calamity that they lost all presence of mind, and failed to use the means at hand, consisting of the steam pump in the pumping house and the fire engine "Lake Shore," and its hose, which might have been attached to the steam pump in time to save life. The steamer belonging to the Fire Department, and also the "Protection" fire engine, were hauled more than a mile through a blinding snow-storm and over roads rendered almost impassable by drifted snow, and arrived on the ground too late to save human life; but nothing should have prevented the chief engineer from making all possible efforts to extinguish what fire there remained. For his failure to do this he is responsible. That the persons deceased whose bodies were identified, and those whose bodies and parts of bodies were unidentified, came to their deaths by the precipitation of the aforesaid cars in which they were riding into the chasm in the valley of Ashtabula creek, left by the falling of the bridge as aforesaid, and the crushing and burning of the cars aforesaid, for all of which the railway company is responsible.

The Jackson-Dickinson Duel.

Gen. W. G. Harding, of Tennessee, says that on one occasion, visiting Gen. Jackson, he asked the gruff old soldier in the course of conversation if brave men were ever frightened, adding: "The world, and especially those who know you most, accord you as much courage as belongs to man." Gen. Jackson replied: "If that be so, sir, I would say that I have been as badly frightened as any man ought ever be. It was, sir, when I fought the duel with Mr. Dickinson. In the first place, sir, I had no unkind feeling against Mr. Dickinson, and no disposition to injure a hair of his head. I had gone as far as an honorable man could go to avoid the difficulty with Dickinson; he had not injured me, and, therefore, I had no ground of complaint against him; my quarrel had been with his father-in-law, Col. Erwin. I knew Dickinson to be a brave, honorable gentleman, and the best shot with a pistol I ever saw—far better than myself, for I was never an expert with that weapon. I knew that he could shoot quicker and truer than I could. I therefore went upon the ground expecting to be killed, and I owe the preservation of my life on that occasion to the fashions of the day, for I wore a coat with rolling collar and very full-breasted; but, fortunately for me, sir, I was organized with a very narrow chest. Dickinson's ball struck very near the center of my coat, and, while it scraped the breast-bone, it did not enter the cavity of the chest. In an instant, under the impression that I was perhaps mortally wounded, and upon the impulse of the moment, I fired and my antagonist fell—and no event of my life, sir, have I regretted so much. My determination before and after taking position was to discharge my pistol in the air, but because I felt the effect of his shot I fired at him. Just here, sir, let me add that the world has done me great injustice, for I am charged with having brought on the difficulty, and with having fixed the terms so as to reserve my fire and advance; and it charges me with having advanced upon Dickinson and shot him when I was within a few feet of him—all of which is false, sir. I fired instantly after receiving his shot, and from my position; and Dickinson stood in his position and received fire like a brave man as he was."

A cloak of partridge feathers is being made by an industrious young lady in England. Ten thousand feathers of different sizes will be required, the tail feathers being used for the lower part, the breast plumage coming above, and the variegated neck feathers being intended to encircle the throat.

OLEOMARGARINE.

Which is the Technical Name for Artificial Butter—The Produce Dealers and Dairymen Up in Arms Against It.

[From the Chicago Tribune.]

The produce dealers all over the Northwest, especially those in Chicago, which is the largest market in this part of the country, are about to commence a war on oleomargarine, with a view, if possible, of protecting themselves and preventing further imposition upon the public. The manufacture and sale of this "grease" as a substitute for butter, without telling the purchaser what it is, has made terrible inroads into the legitimate trade in the East, and lessened the demand for "Western" for exportation to such an extent that the price has fallen 4 or 5 cents a pound within the last three weeks. Last month, according to the circulars, 3,000,000 pounds of this stuff was sent abroad, mainly to Liverpool, for use in England and Scotland.

What the dealers in the West complain of is the selling of oleomargarine for butter—representing it to be what it is not, and, by offering it for several cents below the price of "Western," inducing shippers to buy it, thus making them partners in the fraud. As at present prepared, it will deceive ninety-nine in a hundred customers. A little genuine butter and usually milk is churned in with the oils, and annotto, to give it a rich color, and salt are added, and it is branded "choice dairy," or "Rockford," or some other well-known name. Any one who has handled much butter can tell oleomargarine in a moment, but the purchaser for use pays without question nearly the price of a good article for an injurious, bogus compound, and never knows the difference. The test of dealers are looks and taste. The "grease" hasn't the grain of butter; it is greasy in appearance, and on the tryer, instead of globules of cream, like beads, there are seen globules of oil. The first taste is pleasant, somewhat like cream butter, but when a piece has been swallowed the "twang" is disagreeable and reminds one of tallow.

The principal factories are in Cincinnati and New York, and an enormous quantity is sold all over the East. Many of the hotels, good, bad and indifferent, use it on their tables, knowingly, because it is cheaper than butter; and thousands of families "butter" their bread with it and never suspect its true character.

There is a difference of opinion about its adaptability to cooking. Some say it is not healthy, because the suet is stale, and others that no harm will result from its use.

A new industry has lately sprung up in connection with the business—the combining the oils with milk and making "cream cheese." Thousands of boxes were put on the market before this cheat was discovered, and a Cincinnati manufacturer was so much ashamed of himself that he buried 2,000 of the bogus cheeses. Others in this city practiced the same deception, expecting to realize much money by the speculation, but detection resulted in considerable loss, and the biters were bitten.

At a recent meeting of the Chicago Produce Exchange, the matter of securing legislative protection came up, and while many were in favor of petitioning for relief, others were opposed to it. No action was taken.

The Produce Exchange of New York have ruled out the "grease" unless it is sold as such.

Within the past week, the Secretary of the National Egg and Butter Association has sent printed petitions to dealers in various parts of the country requesting them to get signatures. The document alludes to the growing traffic in oleomargarine, says the stuff is injurious, and asks the Legislature to pass a law requiring it to be branded with its proper name. Thus far only a few have signed the petitions, as those having charge of them have not had time to circulate them. The association will meet in this city on the 7th of next month, and something will doubtless be then done toward securing the protection which the dealers generally demand.

The establishment of the experiment station at Middletown, Conn., to examine and report upon the merits of fertilizers is said to save the farmers from $50,000 to $100,000 yearly.

AGRICULTURAL AND DOMESTIC.

Around the Farm.

If anything is needed by the family and you have not the money to pay for it, see if you have not some commodity which you can exchange for it. Every farmer should have many products for sale. If you cannot get it in this way see if it cannot be done without. Under no circumstances create a debt unless it be a positive necessity. You can endure privations better than you can the duns of a creditor or the visits of an officer.

To Mix Paints.—In mixing paints, observe that, for out-door work, you must use principally, or wholly, boiled oil, unless it is for the decorative parts of houses, etc., then mix as for in-door work. For in-door work use linseed oil, turpentine, and a little dryers, observing that the less oil the less will be the gloss, and that for flatted white, etc., the color being ground in oil, will scarcely require any further addition of that article, as the object is to have it dull.

An excellent liniment to apply to sores on horses' backs, legs or elsewhere can be made as follows: Take inner bark of the ordinary white oak boiled down in an iron kettle until it is as black as ink; while boiling, drop in a piece of alum about the size of a hen's egg. Never use a brass kettle to boil it in. This liniment is to be applied with a sponge, and, indeed, it is good for any sore or bruise. It is a safe thing to keep in any one's barn ready to use when occasion requires.

Rules for Milking.—The following rules are issued from a New York cheese factory for the use of its patrons, and are worthy of a wider dissemination: 1. Milch cows should have free access at all times to good running water. 2. They should never be heated, by being run, stoned or dogged. 3. The utmost cleanliness should be observed in milking, and by no means wet the hands in the milk while milking. 4. No can of milk should stand where it will absorb the barnyard or stable odor, or any other scent. 5. The milk should be strained and well aired immediately after having been drawn from the cows. 6. Some arrangement for effectually cooling is at all times very desirable, and, when the milk is kept at home over night, is indispensable. 7. Scalding all vessels used about milk at least once a day with boiling water, and rinsing with cold water at night, is essential.

Plant Early Potatoes Only.—Prof. McAfee, of the Iowa Agricultural College, advises the planting of early varieties of potatoes only, in order to cut off the supply of food for the potato beetles late in summer. This, we think, is an excellent suggestion, and for other reasons than those named by Prof. McAfee. There are, at least, two broods of this insect in a season throughout the greater part of the Northern and Middle States, and in some favorable localities three. Now, if none but the earliest varieties of potatoes are planted, the tops will be ripe by the time the first brood of beetles have come to maturity. The second brood not finding its favorite food in abundance, a large portion must perish, for, say from the 1st of August until the following spring is rather too long a time for the mature insect to live, especially if short of food. It is generally the second or last brood of the season which hibernates, passing through the winter in safety; but by cutting off the supply of food we may at least lessen the number which are to pass over to the following season. It is worth trying; in fact, anything which is likely to lessen the number of this great pest should receive due attention at this time.—Rural New Yorker.

About the House.

A small dish of charcoal placed in your meat larder will keep the article sweet and wholesome almost as well as ice. Occasionally for cleaning the teeth it will sweeten the breath when nothing else will do so.

Rheumatic Cure.—A lady sends the following to an afflicted correspondent of the Germantown Telegraph. One drachm of hydriodate of potash, four ounces of the tincture of gentian; take one table-spoonful in the same quantity of water, four times a day, at 7, 11, 3 and 7 o'clock.

Sausages.—Try it with good strong herbs and pepper: One hundred pounds of meat cut fine, four ounces of sage put through a fine sieve, two pounds of salt, half ounce of cayenne, two ounces of black pepper and one-half ounce of summer savory passed through a fine sieve. Mix thoroughly.

Orange Fritters.—One pound flour, one pint of milk, with a teaspoonful of salt in it, and a quarter pound of melted butter, and three eggs beaten very light. Prepare four oranges by removing the yellow rind and every particle of white pith, divided into small pieces without breaking the skin. In each spoonful of butter put a piece of orange, and fry a golden brown; sift powdered sugar over as soon as taken from the pan.

Breakfast Poached Eggs.—Place a frying-pan of salted boiling water on the fire, filled with as many small muffin-rings as it will hold; break the eggs singly in a cup and pour into the rings; boil them two and a half or three minutes; remove the rings, and take up the eggs singly in a strainer; serve on half slices of nicely browned and buttered toast of baker's bread; put a small piece of butter on each egg; pepper slightly, and garnish with sprigs of parsley. Serve hot.

To Destroy Warts.—A medical exchange states that a drachm of nitrate of silver dissolved in an ounce of nitro-muriatic acid makes a solution which, applied to warts with a fine brush, will permanently cure them in four days. We may add that we know of nothing better to remove warts than the leaves of the common bean. Crush the leaves between the fingers, and squeeze out the juice upon the warts two or three times a day, until they dry up and disappear. The cure will generally be complete in less than a week.—Journal of Chemistry.

To Clean Kid Gloves.—Lay them on a clean board, and first rub the surface gently with a clean sponge dampened with camphene or a mixture of camphene and alcohol. Then dip each glove into a cup containing the camphene, lift it out, squeeze it in the hand, and again rub gently with the sponge, to remove all the wrinkles. After this gather up the cuff in the hand and blow it to puff out the fingers, when it may be hung up by a thread to dry. This operation should not be conducted near a fire, owing to the inflammable nature of the camphene vapor.

WARRIORS OF THE SEA.

Death of Six Admirals Since the Beginning of the Year.

[From the Springfield Republican.]

The death of six Admirals of the United States navy since the opening of 1877 is quite remarkable, although these worthies of the sea go down in such fullness of honors and of years as to make the coincidence happy rather than ominous. Their average age was 72, and their careers exemplify all the glories of our navy and none of its disgraces. All of these men were active during our last war, when they were already old men. While the fighting and the honors on the land fell into the hands of young men, on the sea the old salts were the main reliance and stood up to the work well. Farragut was 63 when he hung in the rigging of the Hartford during the battle of Mobile bay.

Alden was a native of Portland, a comrade of Wilkes in the South sea, and constantly in active service during the rebellion, being the youngest of the six, only 67. Bailey was born at Plattsburg, and was a boy of 11 years when Commodore Macdonough won his spunky fight with the British cruisers on Lake Champlain in 1814. He captured 150 blockade runners, it is said, during the last war. Davis was of Boston, a writer of naval mathematics, and the captor of Memphis in 1862. Louis Goldsborough (his middle name, Malesherbes, smacks of events contemporary with his birth) was in the service probably the longest of any, entering as a middy in 1812, when only 7 years of age, perhaps by favor of his father, who was Governor of Maryland. He was in a fight with Greek pirates fifty years ago, and was with Burnside at Roanoke. He married a daughter of Wirt, and one of the asides of his life was an attempt to colonize Florida with German emigrants. Smith was Kentucky born, and was at the barrier forts in China in 1856, and on the Congress when she was sunk by the Merrimac in Hampton roads. He was McClellan's coadjutor in the melancholy peninsula of Yorktown—who forgets it? Wilkes was, in some respects, the most celebrated of them all. He was born in New York, and was a nephew of John Wilkes, the English radical of the last century. He had a name before the war of the rebellion broke out, his antarctic explorations in 1839–42, and his contributions to literature having given him a world-wide fame. His taking of Mason and Slidell from the British mail steamer Trent in 1861 was a splendid feat, which won the applause of the country, and, necessarily, the formal disavowal of the Government. It broke the force of Mason and Slidell's mission, however, for England could not participate in an intrigue against us in view of our honorable conduct in that case.

The most egregious fame to which seamen reach is narrow compared with that enjoyed under similar achievements on land. Their lives, when not on this element, are usually lives of privacy and retirement, and an Admiral a hundred miles from the coast is as rare as a three-decker in the same locality. They seem to graduate from the ocean directly into that other life,

When the fiery fight is heard no more
And the storm has ceased to blow.

NARROW ESCAPE.

Heroic Efforts of a Four-Year-Old to Save from Drowning Her Two-Year-Old Brother.

The Detroit Free Press relates the following: "On Wednesday last two of Mr. Shefferly's children, one a boy 2 years old and the other a girl 4 years of age, while playing back of their father's house stepped upon the ice on a pond to have a slide. The little boy toddled forward and made a move as though to slide, but missed his footing and went down with such force as to break through into the water. The sister, who had slid across the pond in safety, heard the ice crack and the cries of her brother, and, turning, saw his perilous situation. With presence of mind almost as wonderful as her heroism, she ran over the ice and caught her brother by the hair. Just as she did so the treacherous ice gave way beneath her, and, with screams of terror, both children began floundering in the water. The girl seemed not to think of herself, as with both arms she tried to lift the boy out, forcing her own head under water at every attempt. At last she succeeded in finding a portion of the ice which was solid enough to support her, and, with one hand to support herself above the water, she tugged with the other at her brother, who had become insensible. The screams of the children were heard by a man named Jacob Kraft, and as he ran across the vacant lots to their assistance he saw the whole of the struggle as related above. When within a few rods of them he saw that the girl had succeeded in getting her brother out of the water, but when she attempted to get out herself the ice again broke, and for the third time both fell back into the pond. Kraft reached the pond, and, jumping in, soon had both children upon terra firma. The girl, scarcely able to move, lay upon the ground looking anxiously at Kraft as he worked to restore the little boy to consciousness, which he at length succeeded in doing. By that time Mrs. Shefferly arrived and the children were taken in the house, both very weak, the boy's condition being so serious that for several hours it was doubtful whether his life could be saved."

The Whipping Post.

The number of intelligent persons who advocate the re-establishment of that venerable institution seems to be unusually large. They assert that the professional criminal fears the lash more than he does any other form of punishment, except hanging, and argue that it is wisdom to give criminals the punishment of which they stand most in dread.

Two young women cowhided a man in the street in Lexington, Ind., and he, lapsing from politeness, nearly killed one of his assailants with a club.

THE NEW CABINET.

Brief Biographical Sketches of the Gentlemen Composing It.

The following is a short historical review of the public lives of the members of the Cabinet of President Hayes:

WILLIAM MAXWELL EVARTS,

Secretary of State, was born at Boston Feb. 6, 1818. He was educated at Yale College, and was a member of the class of 1837. After a course of study in the Harvard Law School, he was admitted to the bar of New York in 1841, where by his superior power and force of intellect, he soon rose to a degree of prominence which he has since maintained. The degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him in 1857, from Union College, in 1865 from Yale, and in 1870 from Harvard. In 1868 he was the leading counsel of Andrew [illegible] impeachment, [illegible] from the end of that trial till the close of Johnson's administration he was Attorney General. He was the counsel for the [illegible] the Alabama [illegible] in 18[illegible]. The position of Attorney General under Johnson, is the only public office he ever held. His residence is, at present, New York city.

JOHN SHERMAN,

Secretary of the Treasury, comes from a distinguished Connecticut family, founded by a refugee Roundhead from Essex, England. His father, Charles Robert Sherman, a lawyer, removed to Ohio in 1810, and became a Judge of the Supreme Court. He married young, and had a family of eleven children. Of the sons, William Tecumseh Sherman is the General of the army. John Sherman was the eighth child. He was born at Lancaster, Ohio, May 10, 1823, and received his early education at Mount Vernon, Ohio. At 14 he was sent to the Muskingum Improvement to earn his own living and to learn civil engineering. After two years political changes deprived him of his position, and he began the study of law at Mansfield, Ohio, with his brother, Charles T. Sherman, afterward United States District Judge. He studied Latin and read largely of English standard authors. He was licensed to practice law the day after he became of age. For eleven years he was a partner with his older brother. "John rode the circuits," it is stated, "Charles managed the business and counseled in the office."

John Sherman, as a politician, was a member of the National Whig Conventions of 1848 and 1852, and in the latter year was chosen a Presidential elector. In 1854 he ran for Congress in the Thirteenth District of Ohio, and was elected. The law firm was then dissolved. He was again elected to the Thirty-fifth and Thirty-sixth Congresses. He was the Republican candidate for Speaker of the latter, and, after an unprecedented contest, wanted only one or two votes to secure his election. During that Congress he was Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. In 1860 he was elected to the Thirty-seventh Congress, but in 1861, on the resignation of Senator Chase, he was elected by the Ohio Legislature to the United States Senate and placed upon its most important committee, that of Finance.

CARL SCHURZ,

Secretary of the Interior, who has been so prominent in public affairs, was born at Liblar, near Cologne, Prussia, March 2, 1829. He was educated at the Gymnasium of Cologne and the University of Bonn, which he entered at the age of 17. At the outbreak of the revolution of 1848 he conducted a Liberal newspaper, but, being concerned in an unsuccessful attempt to promote an insurrection at Bonn, he fled to the Palatinate and took part in the defense of Rastadt. On the surrender of that fortress he escaped to Switzerland. In 1850 he returned secretly to Germany and effected the escape of his compatriot, Gottfried Kinkle. Mr. Schurz came to this country in 1852, and, soon after, took an active part in the anti-slavery movement in the Northwest. He was an influential member of the Republican Convention of 1860, and spoke, both in German and English, during the canvass which followed. President Lincoln appointed Mr. Schurz Minister to Spain, but he returned therefrom in December, 1861, in order to enter the army. He took part in the battles of the second Bull Run, Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, and retired at the close of the war with the rank of Major General. In 1865-6 Gen. Schurz was Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune, and in 1867 he became editor of the Westliche Post, a German newspaper, published in St. Louis. In 1869 he was chosen United States Senator in Missouri for the term ending in 1875. He opposed leading measures of Gen. Grant's administration, and took a prominent part in the organization of the Liberal party, presiding over the convention in Cincinnati which nominated Horace Greeley for the Presidency. He visited Europe in 1873, and again in 1875, being received with much consideration in his native country.

RICHARD W. THOMPSON,

Secretary of the Navy, is a native of Virginia. He was born at Culpepper, in 1800. In 1819 he went to Kentucky, and up to 1831 he was a clerk in a store at Louisville. In that year he went to Terre Haute, taught school and read law, and in 1834 was admitted to the bar and elected to the Legislature, and for several years was a member of that body. In 1837 he acted as Lieutenant Governor under Gov. Noble. He was a Harrison Presidential elector in 1840. The same year he was sent to Congress for two years. He remained in private life until 1847, when he was returned to Congress, and again in 1849. President Taylor appointed him Minister to Austria, and afterward Recorder of the Land Office at Washington, but he declined both positions. He was a prominent Whig, supported Bell and Everett in 1860, and was author of the platform of that party. Lincoln tendered him a position as Judge of the Court of Claims during his first term, but he declined to accept. Since 1861 he has been an active Republican. He was a Presidential elector again in 1864. This was the last public office he held. During the war he raised and drilled four regiments of Indiana troops, and was in command of the camp at Terre Haute. In the Cincinnati Convention last June he was the mouth-piece of his delegation, and made the speech nominating Senator Morton for the Presidency.

CHARLES DEVENS,

Secretary of the Navy, was born at Charlestown, Mass., April 4, 1820, is a graduate of Harvard, and for many years a lawyer. He was United States Marshal in Massachusetts from 1849 to 1853, under Fillmore, and entered the military service in 1861 as Major of a battalion of rifles, closing his army record as a brevet Major General. He was appointed a Judge of the Superior Court in 1869, and subsequently of the Supreme Court. He was nominated for Governor in 1862 by the Democrats against John A. Andrew, but, being at that time in the field commanding a brigade in the Sixth corps, did not come home. He was promoted to the command of a division soon after, and severely wounded at Chancellorsville, where he lost a leg. Since the war he has taken no active part in politics, and has been known as a conservative and independent. He has been on the bench since 1865, and at the time of his appointment was a member of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

DAVID M. KEY,

Postmaster General, is a native of Green county, Tenn., the county seat of which is Greenville, the home of Andrew Johnson. Mr. Key is 54 years old, and a lawyer by profession. He ranks in East Tennessee among the ablest. From 1870, and up to his appointment in 1875 by Gov. Porter, of Tennessee, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Andrew Johnson, Mr. Key presided as Chancellor of the Chattanooga Circuit. During the war he commanded a Confederate regiment raised in East Tennessee.

GEORGE W. M'CRARY,

Secretary of War, was born in Evansville, Ind., in August, 1835, and went with his parents to Keokuk, Iowa, the next year. At the age of 20 he was admitted to the bar; in 1857 he was sent to the Legislature; and from 1863 he was a member of the State Senate for four years. In 1868 he was elected to Congress, and was twice re-elected. He was originally selected for Attorney General, but, after consultation, changed to the war office.

Blondin's stay in Santiago, Chili, has been an uninterrupted success. The papers vie with each other in relating instances of his prowess, and one assures us that in St. Petersburg on one occasion he went through his performance on a rope covered with ice. It may not be out of place to mention a still more remarkable exploit of Blondin's at Vienna. Not only was the rope covered with ice, but the performer traversed it on two stilts twelve feet long, the ends of which had been sharpened and thrust into soda-water bottles; and not only this, but he actually danced the "Liverpool hornpipe" thus accoutred, carrying his secretary on his shoulders, and letting off fireworks at the same time!

JAPAN.

Interesting News From Our Antipodal Neighbors.

By the arrival of the last steamer at San Francisco we get the following interesting grist of news from Yokohama, Japan:

The beneficial effect of the reduction in the land tax is universally admitted. There is great rejoicing in consequence throughout the country. The Government relinquishes several millions of annual revenue, and reduces public expenditure in proportion.

The principal event of the month was the imperial visit to Kioto, the ancient capital, for the purpose of combining ceremonies equally representing ancient and modern Japan. The first object was to pay homage at the shrine of the Emperor's father, in accordance to the custom of all ages. In performance of this duty he was accompanied by the Empress and Empress dowager. The second object of his visit was the opening of a railway between Osaka and Kioto. This ceremony was performed Feb. 5, in presence of a large assemblage of Japanese dignitaries and most of the foreign diplomatists, which latter traveled from Tokio to Kioto by special invitation as guests of the Government. The Emperor remains in the neighborhood of the old capital to complete the round of ceremonial visitations.

The Foreign Office at Tokio, a building of great architectural beauty and many historic associations, has been destroyed by fire.

The financial estimates for the current year have been published by the Minister of the Treasury. Notwithstanding great reductions in the revenue consequent on the diminution of the land tax, the budget shows a prospective surplus of $1,800.

The steamship Nevada, formerly of the Pacific Mail Company, is now transferred to the Japanese flag. This is the last of the transfers of the former American line to Japanese control.

Vries island, at the mouth of Yeddo bay, continues in volcanic eruption.

A larger loan has been offered to China from Japan, partly in gold, silver, and copper coin, and partly in rice, coal, lumber, and seaweed. China pays 8 per cent., and Japan gains 5 per cent. additional on exchange.

A remarkable counterfeit of the notes of the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank by photographing has been detected. Eight notes of $500 each were forged by four persons, an American, an Englishman, a Dane, and a Swede. All are held for trial.

During the past year there have been frequent reports of dangerous disturbances in the provinces of Satsuma, generally without foundation. Now, however, the Government is seriously disturbed by the disordered condition of affairs.

Chicago Elevator Rates.

The elevator and warehouse men of Chicago recently held a meeting to take such action as they might deem necessary in view of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States as to the constitutionality of the present State law. It was decided to ask the Illinois Legislature to amend the Warehouse law—or one clause of it—so that instead of the maximum rate of two cents per bushel for thirty days, for storage, the charge may hereafter be one and one-fourth cents per bushel for the first ten days, and one-half cent for every ten days thereafter, both the time and the rate being shortened. As the majority of the grain goes out inside of twenty days, and the above are the proposed maximum rates, the charges for handling will be materially lessened. The proposed amendment will be a reduction of 40 per cent, on first rates. The elevator and warehouse men claim that they had practically decided to make this reduction before the action of the Supreme Court. Several prominent shippers and receivers have signified their willingness to sign a petition to the Legislature asking that the proposed change in the law be made. It was also decided at the meeting:

1. That grain in store that has already accumulated winter charges, or four cents storage, will be carried through without additional charges to April 15, although the legal rates are six cents.

2. That grain running on first or second storage on March 1 will be placed under the advertised or legal rates, as the holders of the receipts may elect, until April 15.

3. That all grain received since the announcement of the Supreme Court decision sustaining the law will be charged legal rates, and all grain in store at the expiration of winter storage, April 15, will be placed on the same footing under the law.

Big Spiders.

The sands of the steppes of Central Asia are the abiding-place of many species of loathsome and poisonous "creeping things." Mr. Schuyler speaks of a phalange (Solpuga araneoides), one of the long-legged spiders known popularly as the Harvestman, or the Grandfather-Gray-beard, which has long hair, "and, when walking, seems as large as one's two fists." This formidable beast is given to biting when irritated, and with its jaws makes four little holes in the flesh. The bite is poisonous, though not deadly. Its victim feels at first no more discomfort than from the sting of a gnat, but, after a time, the pain spreads over the whole body, and is accompanied with fever and great exhaustion. A Chinese officer states, in his travels in Turkistan, that the body of the largest Solpugas is the size of a butternut; and that of the smaller ones, of a walnut. Spiders of such dimensions, with their big, hairy bodies lifted up on long, stout legs, must be as frightful an adversary as one would be likely to encounter in any experience amid the haunts of wild animals.

The Pittsburgh Post says the roaring sound of a large well recently struck in the oil region can be heard a distance of nine miles. This may be a lie, but we once knew a man struck in his lumbar region with his prospective father-in-law's boot, and the roaring sound of him was heard over in the next townships.—Burlington Hawk-Eye.

INDIANA LEGISLATURE.

Friday, March 9.—Senate.—The Senate took up the General Appropriation bill, and passed it, after making several amendments. The bill appropriates $702,802.82 for the remaining seven months of the present fiscal year, $1,132,000 for the year 1878, and a like amount for the year 1879....Mr. Reeves' bill to establish Probate Commissioners was indefinitely postponed....The House bill appropriating $15,000 to defray the expenses of the special session of the General Assembly was passed....Mr. Baxter introduced a bill establishing a Superior Court in Wayne county, and under a suspension of the rules the bill was passed....House bills were passed declaring the effect of the repeal of statutes; authorizing the appointments of students to Purdue University, and limiting eligibility to the office of township Trustee to two terms....The Senate passed the House concurrent resolution for a sine die adjournment on next Monday.

House.—Senate bills were passed prohibiting illegal voting, and requiring a residence of sixty days in a precinct before voting; requiring affidavits to accompany petitions for [illegible] six to twelve....The House took up the General and Special Appropriation bills, and concurred in the Senate's amendments thereto....Mr. Feats introduced a concurrent resolution for a sine die adjournment next Monday, which was passed....The House joint resolution appointing S. G. Newcomb, A. C. Downey, and J. M. Finch Commissioners to audit the claims of the State against F. B. Ainsworth, late Superintendent of the House of Refuge, was passed....The State House bill was brought up again and passed by a vote of 58 to 42. The bill is substantially the same as the one laid on the table a few weeks ago, the only changes being that it gives the Governor power to appoint the commission, four in number, two from each political party. The bill also provides for 1 cent levy this year and 2 cents next. The plans submitted are to be examined first, and if they are not suitable then the courts are to advertise for others. The cost of the building is limited to $2,000,000....The new Fee and Salary bill relating to the Circuit, Superior, Criminal and Justice Courts, provides that a witness attending the three courts first named, in his own county, shall be allowed $1.25; from another county 5 cents mileage additional for each mile traveled in going and returning from court; witness fees before a Justice of the Peace are 12 per day and 5 cents mileage each way....One of the important provisions of the Election bill passed by the House to-day is that allowing each political party to be represented where the counting is done, by two witnesses, who may remonstrate against any fraud or irregularity that may occur.

Saturday, March 10.—Senate.—Bills were passed extending the time for holding court in Greene county, and amending the act in relation to building associations....Mr. Dykeman introduced a bill authorizing the Governor, Treasurer and Auditor of State to make a temporary loan, not to exceed $200,000. This bill was laid on the table....Two reports were received from the Judiciary Committee on the State House bill, the majority recommending the passage of the bill and the minority opposed to it. The whole afternoon was spent in considering the reports without coming to any conclusion....At the evening session, the Senate resumed consideration of the State House business. Mr. Taylor moved to suspend the rules and put the bill on its passage. Mr. Samighausen moved to lay the motion on the table. Not agreed to. After considerable debate, the motion of Mr. Taylor was lost for want of the two-thirds vote which the constitution requires in order to suspend the rules.

House.—A large number of committee reports were received and placed on file without reading....Senate bills were passed as follows: Requiring County Auditors to furnish certificates to the purchasers of tax titles; authorizing towns to enforce labor for violation of ordinances when trial is had before Justices of the Peace; to legalize the contract between the Commissioners of Porter county and Henry B. Brown; to establish a Superior Court in Wayne county; authorizing building, loan and savings associations to loan their funds to stockholders on personal security, and exempting unplatted lands inside of cities from taxation for city purposes......House bills were passed as follows: Defining vagrancy, and prescribing penalties therefor; authorizing cities and towns to build workhouses; making it a felony to attempt to commit a felony; providing for the payment of one-half of the city taxes in March and one-half in September; making it unlawful to open roads around toll gates; and authorizing the appointment of receivers in vacation....A joint resolution passed suspending the operation of the bill requiring a different style of books to record delinquent-tax duplicates....The bill drafted by the Mayors at their late convention, which provides a new law for the incorporation of cities, was read a third time. The reading of the bill was interrupted several times by motions to adjourn, in order to prevent the Senate from reconsidering its vote and notifying the House of the same.

Monday, March 12.—Senate.—The Senate resumed the consideration of the State House bill, and made the following amendments to the following sections: Section 1 was amended by leaving the date of the appointment of the Commissioners discretionary with the Governor. Section 2 was amended by requiring the Commissioners to swear to the correctness of their claims for services. Section 3 was amended by inserting a proposition accepting the offer of the Marion County Commissioners, tendering rooms for the use of the General Assembly. Section 4 was amended by inserting Louisville in the list of cities in which to advertise for plans. Section 5 was amended so as to allow the Commissioners to annul improper contracts. Section 6 was so amended as to require the architect to guarantee the sufficiency and completeness of each part of the work, under bond of $200,000. Section 7 was amended so as to provide that no contract of over $500 shall be let except at the sessions of the Commissioners, and requiring the filing of all contracts and papers. Sections 8 and 9 were adopted without amendment. Section 10 was amended so as to allow the architect no greater compensation than 3 per cent. for plans, specifications, and superintendence. Section 11 was amended by adding: "And the proceeds of the tax so raised shall be appropriated to the use of the commission as herein provided." The bill as amended was passed by a vote of 30 to 17....The House bill authorizing farmers to form voluntary insurance companies was passed.

House.—The bill drafted by the Mayors was laid on the table....House bills were passed as follows: Authorizing corporations to fix capital stock at $100 per share; allowing restraining orders to be issued during recess; for the election of Road Supervisors; to legalize the records of Courts of Common Pleas; requiring persons contracting for county work to give bond for the payment of employes; authorizing the capture and return of fugitives from the House of Refuge, and compelling notice to be given of pending suits. ....A joint resolution asking Congress to raise the Commissioner of Agriculture to the dignity of a Cabinet officer, and to create a Bureau of Agriculture, failed for want of a constitutional majority.

Tuesday, March 13.—Senate.—The following House bills were passed: Defining vagrancy, and prescribing penalties; providing for the removal of fences from overflowing lands; authorizing the establishment of fire patrols; amending the Election law; authorizing County Commissioners to purchase books of record for Justices of the Peace; for the equitable disposition of the surplus dog-tax fund....A bill fixing the time of electing Road Supervisors was introduced and passed....At the evening session of the Senate the Loan bill was reported from the House, and the Senate immediately took it up. The bill was amended by making provision for a loan of $100,000 in 1878, after which it passed.

House.—A message was received from the Senate announcing the passage of the State House bill with certain amendments. The House took up the bill and concurred in the amendments....The bill providing for the appointment of Commissioners to confer with Commissioners of other States for the adjustment and partition of lands was passed....The Senate joint resolution for a sine die adjournment was taken up and passed. ....The Senate amendments to the Suspected Felon act were concurred in.... Mr. Yaryan, from the Ways and Means Committee, reported back the bill authorizing the Governor, Treasurer and Auditor of State to borrow money to pay the temporary loan debts. The bill was read a third time and passed....The new State House bill has finally passed both houses of the General Assembly. It provides for the appointment of four persons, equally divided politically, who, with the Governor, shall constitute the State House Board. The building is to be located on the site of the present State House, and cost not exceeding $2,000,000.

Wednesday, March 14.—Senate.—A concurrent resolution was adopted referring the claim of Clark county for taxes illegally collected, and of W. H. Drapier to a commission consisting of the Governor, Auditor and Treasurer of State for adjustment....The concurrent resolution directing the State to publish the acts of the regular and special sessions and the journals of the Senate and House in single volumes was passed....W. H. Drapier was allowed $500 for brevier reports for 1875....The employes of the special session were allowed the same compensation as those of the regular session. The Secretary and Assistant Secretary were allowed $25 each, and the Reading Clerk $100 for extra services.

House.—A resolution was passed authorizing the State Librarian to sell the statutes which have been used by the members of the House at $3 per set, the State having paid $12 for them....The vote on the resolution in reference to the removal of the Southern prison, which calls for a committee of five to report the expediency of such removal, was called, and, no quorum voting, the House adjourned.

Thursday, March 15.—Senate.—Nothing of importance was done in the Senate, except to pass a resolution returning thanks to Lieut. Gov. Gray for the impartial manner in which he has presided over the deliberations of the Senate. Gov. Gray delivered appropriate remarks. At 11:40 Mr. Underwood moved to adjourn sine die. Before putting the motion the Chair rose and congratulated the Senate on the successful termination of its labors, after which the Senate adjourned sine die.

House.—The House did nothing but pass resolutions of thanks, and provide for the payment of employes. At 11:50, pending the motion to adjourn, the Speaker delivered his closing address. After prayer by Representative Lanham the House adjourned sine die.

Gambler Devol's Escape.

A correspondent of the Louisville Courier-Journal writes from Milan, Tenn.: Detained at this place, I made the acquaintance of Geo. H. Devol, the gambler. He is a gentlemanly-looking person of 47, dark sandy hair, light sandy whiskers, beginning to show the silver, a quick, piercing gray eye, ruddy complexion, is of good address, and a smart talker. He was born in Ohio, but for thirty years has been a gambler. While operating on the Shortline Road, near Lagrange, he won about $1,[illegible] and five gold watches, and ended the game just as the train was leaving Lagrange on its way to Cincinnati. The victims squealed terribly, and proposed to have their treasure or blood. They marshaled their forces and drew their revolvers. Devol skipped into the rear coach, locking the door as he went. He then went to the rear platform, and, although the train was running at the rate of thirty-five miles an hour, selected a clear spot and jumped. He rolled over at a lively rate, but picked himself up unhurt, though his late friends fired a volley at him from their revolvers. He cut across the country and struck the railroad at Lexington junction and went back to Louisville.

"The closest place I was ever in in my life," said Devol, "was in '50. I was coming up the river from New Orleans in the steamer Fairchild, and had won a great deal of money. The boat landed at Napoleon, and about twenty-five of those killers there, who in those days did not think any more of killing a man than they did a rat, got aboard. I opened out and won a good deal of money and four or five watches. Everything went along smoothly enough until about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, when they began to get drunk. One of them said: 'Where is that damned gambler; I am going to kill him.' 'I'm with you,' said another. 'I, too,' said another. And the whole party rushed to their state-rooms and got their pistols. I slipped up and got between the pilot house and the roof. They searched the boat from stem to stern, but did not think of looking under the pilot house. I whispered to the pilot when he came to a bluff bank to throw her stern in and give me the word and I would run and jump off. At about 6 o'clock he gave me the word, and I ran and jumped. I was weighted down with the watches and gold I had won, and the distance was more than I thought, and I missed the bank and stuck tight, waist deep, in soft mud at the water's edge. The killers saw me, and as the boat swung out they opened fire. I could not move, and the bullets whistled past my ear and spattered mud and water all over my face. I had given the pilot $100 in gold, and he threw the boat out, so that I was out of sight very quick."

Historical Doubts as to Joan of Arc.

It was in a saloon, and they had both of them looked on the beer when it was amber, and, by some process of unnatural selection, had chosen the Maid of Orleans as a subject of discussion. The elder was convinced of her existence; the younger one—a Positivist, as it were—believed that she was a Mrs.—or Miss—Harris; that there never was no such woman. And thus the argument proceeded:

First speaker—"Why don't you believe that such a woman never existed?"

Second speaker—"Because I never saw her—I never knew anything about her." (Doggedly.)

"Did you ever see your great-grandfather?"

"Yes." (With temporary triumph.)

"Did you ever see your great-great-grandfather?"

"No."

"Then how do you know you ever had one?" (Sensation.)

"O, that isn't the same thing."

"Why isn't it?"

Here the second speaker is compelled to shift his position and says: "But Macaulay says she was a myth."

"A what?"

"A myth."

"O, and did you ever see Macaulay?"

"No, of course not."

"Then how do you know he wasn't a myth himself?"

It was some time before the second speaker was able to rally, so to speak, but, having partially done so, he advanced another argument:

"There never was any Joan of Arc, because it was a moral impossibility for any woman to do the wonderful works she did." (This in a dogmatic tone which indicated that he wasn't quite sure as to what those same wonderful works were.)

First speaker (tally)—"Did you e[illegible] h[illegible] of Q[illegible] the [illegible] Jews?"

"I did that."

"And, how when King Holofernes wanted to decoy her and make a deceived woman of her, she slew him with a hammer and a nail, as it might be me and you, and brought victory to the Jews?"

Long silence, broken at last by a friend of the worsted arguer:

"O, she war a regular ould Methusaleh, and that's no criterion to go by." (Bibent omnes.)

A New York Lodging-House.

During the winter sometimes as many as three or four hundred men destitute of a lodging-place have found temporary rest for the night in the old church at Prince and Marion streets. The pews are used for beds, and in the basement of the building are arrangements for bathing, and for washing and drying the scanty clothing of the men, and for two cents lodgers are furnished with a plentiful but rigidly simple meal. The church has been leased by a wealthy gentleman for the special purpose of affording a lodging-house for the destitute.

Two sable philosophers took shelter under the same tree during a heavy shower. After some time one of them complained that he felt the rain. "Nebber mind," replied the other, "dere's plenty of trees. When dis un is wet through we'll go to de oder."

Figures are what is wanted

Not election majorities, but such as interest the great army of American producers. Twenty-five years ago the eight counties of Missouri, now traversed by the Old Reliable Hanibal & St. Joseph Railroad were nearly a wilderness. To-day, by a late census, it is discovered that these counties produce over one-fourteenth of the entire wheat crop of the entire State, over one-twelfth of the corn crop, and over one-ninth of the oats. The same growth of country is now being repeated in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and New Mexico, and the immortal Greeley had this identical route and section of country in mind when he breath those stirring words of wisdom, "Young man, go West." Therefore, it is but natural that parties taking this advice should desire to pass over a road that has done so much for a great State, (especially as it offers the best facilities) and see for themselves. By the Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad, through cars are run from Cleveland and Toledo, and thro' connections made from Cincinnati and Indianapolis, via Quincy, to St, Jo., Atchison and Kansas City, and from Chicago to Kansas City without change. We are about to issue, in connection with our own, a county map of Colorado and New Mexico, giving valuable information as regards time tables, routes, distances, altitudes, &c., which we will be pleased to furnish free, upon application in person or by letter addressed to A Statesman's Opinion.

Daniel Webster.

Small is the sum that is required to patronize a newspaper, and amply rewarded is its patron. I care not how humble and unpretending the gazette which he takes. It is next to impossible to fill the sheet without putting into it something that is worth the subscription price. Every parent whose son is from home, should supply him with a newspaper. I remember what a marked difference there was between those of my schoolmates who had no access to newspapers. Other things being equal the first was always superior to the last in debate composition and general intelligence.

The alarming prevalence of hog cholera in this country, during the past few years, has given rise to various theories as to the cause of the distressing malady. It has been suggested by scientific men that if hogs were allowed to roam in the woods, and eat roots and suck substances from the earth, as they were found in their nativity, there would be no cholera. We were favorably impressed with this theory. When the muscle in the hog's snoot is destroyed, his diet and, to a great extent, his habits are necessarily changed. And it is a fact worthy of our notice that when he was allowed to roam in the forest and run and root at his own sweet will, disease was almost unknown to him. We suggest this to farmers, as worthy of their attention. Try the experiment; let the hog alone with his snoot.

P. T. BARNUM.

Mr. P. T. Barnum, whose renown as a showman is world-wide, a short time since sent agents to Europe to purchase novelties for his American Hippodrome, also to make arrangements for traveling through Europe with a vast collection of wild animals and curiosities of every nature. Purchases have been made for him from Herr Hagenbeck, of Hamburg, and from the Zoological Gardens of London, Berlin, and Amsterdam, an enumeration of which would take up too much space, but the importance of which cannot be too much dwelt upon. In fact, the transportation of his animals will require more room than could be given upon two steamers between deck. From Mr. James Myers, the proprietor of the Great American circus in this city, Mr. Barnum's agents have purchased six of the magnificent Trakene stallions, which Mr. Myers at enormous cost obtained from the stud of the Crown Prince of Germany. These animals are singularly well trained, and unequalled for beauty of frame and action, and will attract great interest in the United States, where such a performance as never been witnessed. They march, trot, galop at the word of command; they wheel left or right with the precision of trained soldiers. A word suffices for these intelligent four footed actors, who go without a blunder through the most complicated figures with a dash and grace charming to witness. In addition to the above attractions, Mr. Barnum's agents have purchased trained horses and ponies from the Messrs. Sanger, of London, and will thus have rendered the Barnum Hippodrome the most complete and attractive of places of amusement. To Mr. Mayers alone, Mr. Barnum's agents paid over 400,000fr.

A Hunt with Texas Jack.

Texas Jack has returned from a hunt in the Sweetwater country with a party of Englishmen, and has had a talk about it with a writer for the Spirit of the Times There were seven men in the company. The game consisted chiefly of elk black tailed deer, antelope, and mountain sheep. No hostile Indians were encountered. The only dangerous brute in the West to hunt Jack says, is the bear. He is cunning, swift, and always ready for a fight. He thinks that the best place to hunt bears is where there are not many to be found, and of the grizzley he says: "He will stand in the middle of the road, growling and getting his mad up, when there isn't a live creature within forty miles of him. If you meet one, and turn out for him, he will probably leave you alone, but if you say a word look out for him. Many a time I have made some such word as, 'Where are you going, Tommy?' when in an instant his arms would be up, and ready to tear me to pieces. No, sir, we dont go bear hunting very much. You see, they can run as fast as a horse, and you have to put a bullet into just such a place to kill them, and until they are dead they are dangerous." Jack, in conclusion tells this story: "I was out once with a party in Texas, and we came across a big cinnamon bear. A fellow proposed to capture him with his lasso. He made a good throw, and got the loop around the bear's neck. When old cinnamon felt it get tight, what do you think he did? He just sat on his haunches, felt of the rope with one paw, and then began pulling it in hand over hand. There was a horse and a man at the other end of the rope, but they had to come, both of them. As for the hunter, he jumped off and got away, but the bear drew the pony right up to him and killed him.

Artemas Ward on Woman's Rights.

One of the most amusing things ever penned by the lamented humorist, "Artemas Ward," was the following on "woman's rights:"

I pitched my tent in a small town in Injiana one day last season, and while I was standing at the dore takin in money a deppytation of ladies came up and said the was members of the Bunkumville Female Reformin & Wimmen's Rites Association, and they axed me if they cood go in without payin.

"Not exactly," sez I, "but you can pay without goin in."

"Dew you know who we are?" said one of the wimmen— a tall and ferroshus lookin critter—"dew you know who we air, sir?"

"My impression is," said I, from a kersory view, that you are shemales."

"We air, sir," said the feroshus woman; "we belong to a society which believes wimmen has rights—which believes she is endowed with as much intellect as man is—which believes she is trampled on and abused—& who will resist hence 4th and forever the encroachments of proud and domineering men."

During her discourse the eccentric female grabbed me by the coat coller & was swinging her umbreller wildly over my head.

"I hope marm," sez I, startin back, "that your intention is honorable? I am a lone man in a strange place. Besides, I've got a wife to hum."

"Yes," cried the female, "and she's a slave! Doth she never dream of freedom—doth she never dream of throwing off the yoke of tyranny and thinkin and voten for herself? Doth she never think of these things?"

"Not being a natural born fool," sez I by this time a little riled, "I ken safely say she doth'unt."

"O, whot—whot!" screamed the female, swingin her umbreller in the air. "O, whot is the price that woman pays for her experience!"

"I don't know," sez I, "the price to my show is 15 cents per individooal."

"& can't our society go in free?" asked she.

"Not if I know it," sais I.

"Crooil man!" she cried and burst in tears.

"Won't you let my darter in?" said another of the eccetric wimmen, takin me affekshuntely by the hand. "O' please let my darter in! She's a sweet gushing child of nature."

"Let her gush," roared I, as mad as I could stick at their tarnel nonsense. "Let her gush." Whereupon they all sprung back with the simultaneous observation that I was a beeste.

"My female friends," said I, "bef you leeve, I've a few remarks to remark; way them well. The female woman is one of the greatest institutions of which this land can boast. It is impossible to get along without her. Had there been no female wimmen in the world I should scarsley be here with my unparalleld show on this very occoshun. She is good in sickness—good in wellness—good at all times. O, woman, woman!" I cried, my feelings worked up to a hippolitic pitch, "you are an angel when you behave yourself, but when you take off your proper apparel and (mettyforically speeking) get into pantaloons—when you desert your firesides, and, with head full of wimmen's rites noshuns, go round like lions seeking whom you may devour somebody—in short, when you undertake to play man you play the devil and are an emphatic noosance. My female friends," I continued as they were indignantly departin, "way well what A. Ward has sed."

In reading a trial list of court proceedings, the Selinsgrove (Pa.) Times says, there occur Latin abbreviations some persons may not understand. For example: John Doe vs. Richard Roe. The "vs" is short for "versus," which is the Latin word corresponding to the English "against." Again, Dan Jones et al. vs. Mickel Bones et ux. "Et" is the Latin word for "and" in English; "al." stand for "alius," another, in the singular number, masculine gender, or for "alii," others, in the plural. "Ux" is the Latin for "wife." Hence, Don Janes et al. vs. Mickel Bones et ux., should read in English, "Dan Jones and other (or others) against Mickel Bones and wife." It don't follow, though, since you understand this much of "law," that you must now become a lawyer!

JAMES C. MERRITT.
Highland Falls, Orange Co. N. Y.

TWENTY YEARS AGO.

I've wandered in the village, Tom,
I've sat beneath the tree
Upon the school-house play-ground,
Which sheltered you and me;
But none were there to greet me, Tom,
And few were left to know
That played with us upon the green,
Some twenty years ago.

The grass is just as green, Tom—
Barefooted boys at play
Were sporting, just as we did then,
With spirits just as gay;
But the master sleeps upon the hill,
Which, coated o'er with snow,
Afforded us a sliding-place,
Just twenty years ago.

The old school-house is altered now,
The benches are replaced
By new ones, very like the same
Our pen-knife had defaced;
But the same old bricks are in the walls,
The bell swings to and fro,
Its music just the same, dear Tom,
As twenty years ago.

The spring that bubbled 'neath the hill,
Close by the spreading beech,
Is very low—'twas once so high,
That we could almost reach;
And kneeling down to get a drink,
Dear Tom, I started so,
To see how much that I had changed,
Since twenty years ago.

Near by the spring, upon the elm,
You know I cut your name—
Your sweetheart's just beneath it, Tom,
And you did mine the same.
Some heartless wretch hath peeled the bark,
'Twas dying, sure, but slow,
Just as the one whose name we cut,
Died twenty years ago.

My eyelids had been dry, Tom,
But tears came in my eyes;
I thought of her I loved so well,
Those early, broken ties—
I visited the old churchyard,
And took some flowers to strew
Upon the graves of those we loved,
Some twenty years ago.

Some are in the churchyard laid,
Some sleep beneath the sea—
But few are left of our old class
Excepting you and me;
And when our time shall come, Tom,
And we are called to go,
I hope they'll lay us where we played,
Just twenty years ago.

THE LOST BANK NOTE.

"James," said Mrs. Garret, while sitting at breakfast one morning, "I don't like that new girl. I have my suspicions about her."

"About Ann!" returned Mr. Garret, in surprise. "Why, it's only a few days ago that I heard you boasting to Mrs. Breumer you had the best cook in New York."

"So she is a good cook. I don't expect to get such another for twice the wages. It is not about the work—she does all that well—but I've no trust in her."

"What has she done?"

"What has she done?" echoed the lady, somewhat sharply. "Nothing, of course, or I'd send her packing! But she's sly and secret, and won't tell me anything about herself; and has ridiculous airs about sleeping alone, and won't even allow Amanda inside her bedroom door. There's something wrong, depend upon it. If there wasn't a screw loose somewhere she would not be here for such low wages."

"If that's a fault against her you can raise them," suggested Mr. Garret.

"There, James, you may as well go to your office, if that's all you have to say," cried the lady of the house. "But mark my words before you go, I'll find Ann Walker out before long."

Mr. Garret sighed as he rose to depart. He well knew that remonstrance would avail nothing, for Mrs. Garret's prejudices were as the laws of the Medes and Persians that changeth not, so he took himself off without another word.

"Amanda!" cried the lady, when left alone, "bring Horace up."

In response to this summons a large, slatternly girl of 11 or 12 made her appearance from the basement, with a little boy in her arms, who made a snatch at an egg-stand and knocked it on the floor in passing the table.

"You awkward, careless gypsy!" cried Mrs. Garret, with great spirit; "that's the second thing you've broken this morning. Who do you think is going to pay for all you destroy? Come here, Horace, love, and have a nice piece of toast. What is Ann doing, Amanda?"

"She's dressing the turkey, mum."

"Did she scour the front steps this morning?"

"Yes, mum; she got up at 5 o'clock to do it."

"Go and tell her I expect her to wash the drawing-room windows before dinner."

"Upon my word," muttered Mrs. Garret, resentfully, as Amanda retired to carry her message, "I'll pull her pride down for her a bit. Must wash the steps at 5 in the morning, forsooth, lest folks see her at it. I'll take that out of her!"

In a few minutes Ann came up to clear the dishes off. She was tall and well-proportioned, about 20 years of age, her face pale, refined in features, not handsome, but singularly intelligent and earnest in its expression.

She looked a little anxious and troubled as she noiselessly arranged the room, and when she was ready to go she said, in a very soft voice:

"May I ask a favor, ma'am, that the cleaning of the front windows be put off till early in the morning?"

"No," answered the mistress, curtly, "I want them done now."

"I don't wish to be seen by passers-by," she urged, almost pleadingly. "It is of importance for me not to be seen by—by some one who might know me."

"You will obey my orders, girl, or leave the house!" returned Mrs. Garret, beginning to quiver with temper.

The servant curtesied and withdrew.

In a few minutes she was at the windows, but in a close sunbonnet, to Mrs. Garret's unspeakable disgust.

"I think I can see through my lady," was her inward comment. "She's some jailbird the detectives are after. I'll lay a trap for her, and if she's not caught in it my penetration isn't much."

Rising from her sewing machine, which she had been busily plying in Master Horace's behalf, while her brain busily revolved, she unlocked her desk, took from it a $20 note, carefully marked the number, and dropped it, as if by accident, under the edge of the table. Then she cut and basted some more work, making rubbish enough about the floor to insure the servant having to use her dust-pan before dinner. By the time this was accomplished she discovered little Horace and the machine in such danger of coming to grief together that, first driving that innocent to the other side of the room, and then picking up the scattered shuttles and reels, she called Ann up stairs to put the parlor to rights, and left the room, taking Horace with her.

When Mr. Garret came home to dinner he saw by his wife's portentous face that something dreadful had occurred.

"James," said she, solemnly, "I have found that girl out in a theft."

"Who? Amanda?"

"Pshaw! no. Your superior girl, Ann. She has helped herself to $20 of mine."

"Good gracious!" cried Mr. Garret, pausing in the act of carving the turkey.

"Yes; it was a $20 note which—ahem—happened to fall out of my desk on the floor this forenoon. I was busy with Horace and so—ahem—forgot to pick it up before I left the room. When I came down to dinner I instantly missed it, and the abandoned creature actually said she might have swept it into the dustpan and burnt it. Fortunately I have the number of it, and after dinner you must go immediately and fetch a policeman."

Bewildered, though far from convinced by the proof of Ann's guilt which his spouse cited, Mr. Garret suffered himself to be sent off on his errand of justice, and soon returned with a detective, armed with a warrant, and Ann was imperatively rung up, while Amanda was ordered to remain, that she might take a warning from the event to take place.

"Ann," said her master, feeling very small, "Mrs. Garret misses some money, and this man has come to——"

"Find it, my dear," rejoined the officer, who had been regarding her with undisguised interest. "So if you'll hand over the keys of your kit we'll proceed to business instanter."

"And," said Mrs. Garret, sternly, "if the stolen property is found in your possession, you will go to prison, miss—that you shall."

Ann's white face slowly kindled with a scorching red; her large dark eyes dilated with a deep horror; her lips turned pale; her breath seemed to leave her in a gasp.

"You accuse—me of theft?" she faltered.

Mr. Garret silently put her into a chair. She looked as if the shock would strike her dead.

"Do you deny," demanded Mrs. Garret, none the less spitefully for this attention, "that you picked up that $20 bill that was dropped on the carpet, just on this spot, this afternoon? Haven't you got it in your pocket, or trunk, or hidden about your bedroom at this moment? Go on with the search, Mr. Officer; she's determined not to confess. It was a national bank bill for $20, numbered 109,933."

"Seems to me I've seen your face before this, my gal," muttered the officer, confidentially. "You'll please fork over the key of your kit, young woman."

With trembling hands Ann waved him off, and untied a ribbon from about her neck, on which a small key was suspended.

As she gave it to him a sort of sob shook her, and large tears rushed in a torrent down her cheeks.

"I'll show the way," said the mistress of the house, sure by these signs of sorrow that the note was about to be discovered. "James, keep your eye on the unprincipled wretch, for there's no knowing what she may do."

Arriving at Ann's miserable bedroom the officer coolly rifled the pockets of all the dresses to be found hanging up, and not finding what he sought dragged the single trunk out under the skylight, and unlocked it.

Very neatly arranged were poor Ann Walker's simple belongings. Some daintily frilled underclothing, smelling of lavender, her modest Sunday apparel folded by itself in silver paper, a box of plain linen collars and cuffs, one or two books of such unexpected titles as "Longfellow's Hyperion," "The Holy Grail," by Tennyson, and some of Madame Michelet's in the original French and a beautiful mother-of-pearl desk in the very bottom, with the silver initials "A. W. A." in a silver monogram on the top.

"Now I'm blest if this ain't a pretty kit for a servant girl," remarked the detective, trying to pry it open with a penknife.

"A wholesale robber," groaned Mrs. Garret, clasping her hands; "and to think that I have harbored—"

"Hullo," cried the detective, opening the lid, and taking out a silver photograph case, richly chased, and garnished with an elaborate monogram, "Who's this."

Then the pair had a fine surprise.

Opening the case, they saw two cartes—one of a majestic-looking military man, apparently about 60, and the other of a young girl clad in silk and richest lace, whose face bore the exact similitude of Ann Walker's vignette.

"By the hooky!" ejaculated the officer, a light breaking all over his face, and astonishment preventing further articulation.

Taking a greasy pocket-book out of his pocket he opened it, and drew forth a photograph, which was Ann Walker's vignette.

"Them two's the same gal?" asked he, eagerly.

"Yes," answered the lady with a glance.

"I thought I had spotted that gal the moment I set eyes on her," cried the man, exultingly; "and to think of me finding her after all, and three of us a-huntin' for her these six months. I'm a made man. Won't the Gineral plank down the thousand pounds reward! Hoorar!"

"What do you mean?" asked Mrs. Garret. She began to believe she had been sheltering a very great criminal indeed.

"What do I mean?" grinned the detective. "Why, that you have made the orkardest mistake, missis, you ever made in your life. You've heard of Gen. Arnim as lives in the marble palace up the Hudson?"

"Of course I have—indeed have some acquaintance with him." "Or would give the universe to scrape one," she might with truth have added.

"That's unlucky for you," observed the officer, with an obvious lack of sympathy; "for you see, this here cook as you have accused of stealing, is his only daughter and heiress"—

"What?"

Mrs. Garret sat down on a broken-backed chair, with a face as pale as a ghost.

To think that her penetration should have served her so ill as to suffer her to insult this lady—this daughter of one of the grandest magnates of society.

"How in heaven's name can I apologize for my mistake?" she gasped. "I'll die of shame outright!"

"Meanwhile, we haven't found the bank note," observed the officer with malace prepense. "Shall I go on with the search?"

"No, no! gracious sake, leave me! Let me think!" groaned our friend in real anguish of mind.

So the officer went down stairs with a very different manner from that in which he had ascended.

Meanwhile the following interview had taken place between the master of the house and the accused:

"Sir," said the latter, as soon as they were alone. "I think you have the feelings of a gentleman. Further concealment is useless, and before I leave this house I owe you an explanation."

Mr. Garret thought this was the beginning of a confession of guilt, and said:

"Yes, Ann," very sadly, but kindly.

"I am not what I seem," pursued Miss Arnim, in an agitated manner.

"You may have heard of, six months ago, Gen. Arnim's daughter, who disappeared."

"Heavens," muttered Mr. Garret, who feared poor Ann was insane.

"My father," slowly continued Miss Arnim, "wished me to marry a gentleman who was in every way repugnant to me, I having already given my heart to another whose want of fortune was his only fault. I would not disobey my father by following the dictates of my heart, yet how could I go through the daily sorrow of thwarting his express wishes! I resolved to escape from both temptations at a time, and I could think of no way in which I could more securely hide myself than by going into service for awhile. I confided my story to the good manageress of the 'Domestic Training Institution,' who was a friend of mine, and through her influence I came here with the determination of doing my duty as conscientiously as it was possible. You have seen the result, Mr. Garret."

She burst into tears, though her eyes flashed through them with proud indignation.

By this time the earnestness of her manner and the calm refinement of her language had carried the conviction of truth to her listener's heart. He gazed at her in amazement and distress, while a flood of shame dyed his brow.

The detective now entered, and, with a deeply respectful obeisance to the woman he had treated so insolently ten minutes ago, said:

"Please accept my humble service, Miss Arnim, and to pardon my mistake. What can I do for you, miss?"

"Bring a cab, if you please," said Miss Arnim. Then turning to her former master, she said, pleadingly:

"Let me ask as a particular favor, sir, that I may be permitted to go without meeting Mrs. Garret again. I can imagine now," she added, with a trembling voice, "what innocent and friendless girls feel when they are suspected wrongfully."

Little more remains to be said. The young lady had her wish, and returned to her father's house without another encounter with the amiable mistress; and so overjoyed was the General to receive back her whom he had bitterly mourned as lost by his own cruelty that her engagement to Mr. Merville, a rising young lawyer, was immediately afterward arranged with much rejoicing.

Little Master Horace proved, some weeks afterward, to be the real cause of that bank note's disappearance. It was found stuffed into the cavity under the shuttle of his mamma's sewing machine.

A Screw in the Lungs.

We came into possession a few days since of some facts illustrating a most wonderful and remarkable case, and one that has few if any parallels in this region of the State, and which we give to our readers, vouching for its correctness. In the Smith's Grove region there lives the family of Mr. W. J. Dickerson, a gentleman well and favorably known in the county. In the family there is a bright little boy 9 years old, named James. Last August he and his mother were paring apples for drying purposes with an ordinary machine used for that purpose. A three-eighths inch screw dropped from the machine, and James, child-like, put the screw in his mouth and accidentally sucked it down his windpipe. Violent coughing followed without ejecting the screw. On Sept. 1 the little boy was taken to his bed, first with chills and fever. This was followed by intermittent fever, which in turn was succeeded by pneumonia, and constant coughing, with expectoration from the right lung. The sufferer continued to grow worse, until in spite of the best medical treatment and appliances he wasted away to almost a skeleton from what he had been. Death seemed inevitable and near at hand. Suddenly there ensued a violent jerking cough, and the iron screw was ejected from the right lung, where it had been since he swallowed it, over five months ago. Proper restoratives were given, and the little fellow has been steadily improving and growing rapidly. He is now well, and fat as a pig, and keeps the screw as a memento, while his father and mother are the happiest two people about. The circumstance is certainly a very singular one, and is substantially as we have related it.—Bowling Green (Ky.) Pantagraph.

Bismarck's Troubles.

Bismarck is having an unhappy experience as Chancellor of the German empire, and he complains that his health is suffering under the worry and trouble that he is subjected to by his political adversaries, and also in consequence of the lukewarm support he receives from some of the Cabinet Ministers. In a recent speech in the Reichstag he cited the case of Gen. Von Stosch, Chief of Admiralty, who forced upon the Premier a vast amount of labor in preparing the correspondence to show the necessity of the reduction in the Admiralty estimates which Bismarck advocated, and then, when the matter came up for discussion in the Reichstag, Von Stosch at once consented to the desired reduction upon the demand being made by the Liberals. What he would not do for the Chancellor he would do for the enemies of the latter, and when Bismarck narrated the circumstances in his speech Von Stosch at once tendered his resignation. The Emperor, however, declined to accept it, and the unfriendly Minister remains to harass his chief.

SOMNAMBULISTIC CAPERS.

Remarkable Acrobatic Performance of a Detroit Young Lady in Her Sleep.

[From the Detroit Free Press.]

One of the most remarkable exhibitions of somnambulism ever given in this city took place about 1 o'clock Saturday morning near the corner of High and Sixth streets. The principal actor in the serio-comic drama was an 18-year-old miss, named Annie Barton, and she was first discovered by C. W. Hedges. He was on his way home when his attention was attracted by a queer-looking object seated upon the top of a grapevine arbor just over the fence. Stopping, Mr. Hedges looked at the figure until he saw it move, when he spoke to it, but received no answer. At this juncture, Capt. C. C. Starkweather, of the Trumbull Avenue Police Station, came along Sixth street on his way home. He was stopped by Mr. Hedges, who pointed out the queer figure, and they were not long in doubt as to the nature of the apparition. "It's a woman," said Capt. Starkweather, and "she must be asleep!" continued Mr. Hedges. Arriving at that conclusion, the men opened the gate, and, walking to the arbor, called to the sleeping girl, but received no reply. Capt. Starkweather then began climbing up the arbor, at which the girl started on a lively run, and, going the whole length of the arbor roof, made a jump, clearing a space of about eight feet, alighting on the roof of a woodshed.

This maneuver astonished the men, who awakened Mr. Thompson and his family and told them that there was a sleep-walker upon their woodshed. Soon Mr. Thompson, his wife and son joined Mr. Hedges and the Captain in the chase. What was their surprise to find Miss Barton had clambered from the shed to the wing, and thence to the apex of the roof of the main building, where she stood quietly leaning against the chimney. Finally a ladder was procured and young Thompson climbed to the side of the roof, but, getting there, found it so covered with snow and ice that it was impossible for him to reach the girl. So down he came, and the ladder was carried to the front of the house, where it was put in position, with one end against the roof peak. This time Capt. Starkweather took off his boots and climbed up. The girl stood quietly until he was within a few feet of her, when she ran toward the wing, and sliding went from one roof to the other; thence she jumped back to the grape arbor, and, before any of the men could get to her, jumped to the ground, and, dashing through a back gate, ran up High street. The chase was continued to the Crawford Street Park, where she was captured. Then it was found that she was completely dressed, with the exception of a hat and shawl, and that during all of her hazardous midnight ramble she had not received the slightest injury. She was taken to the Trumbull Street Police Station until her relatives, being notified, put in an appearance and took her in charge. This is the second escapade, her friends assert, of the kind in which Miss Barton has taken part.

Heavy Jewel Robberies in England.

Another heavy robbery of jewelry is reported from England. A number of valuable jewels belonging to the Duchess of Cleveland, the mother of the Earl of Rosebery, were stolen from Battle Abbey, one of the Duke of Cleveland's seats. The value of the jewels is estimated at from £5,000 to £10,000. The articles stolen were chiefly presents, one of them, a necklace of diamonds, rubies and emeralds, being the gift of the Queen to the Duchess, who was a bridesmaid at Her Majesty's wedding. No trace has been discovered of the thieves, and a reward of £200 has been offered for their discovery. The latest previous parallel to this brilliant bit of roguery was the stealing of the Countess of Dudley's dressing-bag, containing about £5,000 worth of jewels, while her maid stood near it at a railway station. Recently two American ladies have been victimized in London—one, Mrs. Stevens, of New York, by a French maid, and the other, Mrs. Ives, now Lady Harcourt, a daughter of Mr. Motley, by a bold rogue who climbed up into the window of Mr. Motley's house in Arlington street, while the Minister and family were at dinner below. The jewels had been laid out on a dressing-table, as the ladies were going to a ball the same evening. In the case of the Duchess of Cleveland, the financial loss, even at the highest figure assigned to it, will hardly be so much felt as the sentimental loss, for the Duke is one of the wealthiest men in England and has no direct heirs. His dukedom dies with him, and his estates will go with the barony of Bernard to a distant kinsman, Morgan Vane, of Huntingdonshire. The Earl of Rosebery is a son of the Duchess of Cleveland by her first marriage with Lord Dalmeny.

From the Slave Pen to the Council of State.

When Edham Pacha, the present Grand Vizier, was a boy he was sold as a slave to the Turkish statesman Khosrev, who, upon discovering his extraordinary abilities, gave him his liberty and sent him to Paris to be educated. He was born in 1823 at Chio, his parents being Circassian. After remaining at Paris three years his patron induced him to study mining engineering, and for four years he followed this pursuit in France, Germany, and Switzerland. Returning to Constantinople in 1869, he was appointed a Captain on the general staff, and ten years later was made an aid-de-camp to the Sultan, subsequently attaining the ranks of General, Chamberlain of the Palace, and member of the Council of State. He has also been Minister of Foreign Affairs and Turkish Ambassador to various European courts. His political affiliation is with the Young Turkish party.

The Grasshopper of Missouri.

Prof. C. V. Riley says of the grasshopper prospect for Missouri, that the counties of Platte, Clay, Jackson, Lafayette, Cass, Johnson, Bates, Henry, Pettis and Benton will be practically free from the plague; but that in certain districts there is every reason to fear a return of the hoppers. These localities are mapped out by the Professor as follows: First, Atchison and Holt and the western part of Nodaway and Andrew, in the extreme northwestern corner. Second, McDonald, Barry, Jasper, Lawrence, Barton, Dade, Cedar, Vernon—more particularly in the southwest half; Polk in the northwest third, Hickory in the southwest third, and St. Clair in scattering places.

FOREST TREES.

Notes on Their Growth.

Milo Barnard, in the Prairie Farmer, gives the following as the measurement of certain trees recently cut down by him. It will be interesting to parties planting trees to note the growth of each variety in a given number of years:

Lombardy Poplar—14 years old; 54 feet in height; 22½ inches in diameter at the base.

Cottonwood—17 years old; 50 feet in height; 18 inches in diameter.

[illegible] Willow—13 years old; 41 feet 8 inches in height; 16½ inches in diameter.

White Willow—13 years old; 46 feet in height; 11½ inches in diameter.

Silver Poplar—15 years old; 42 feet in height; 22 inches in diameter.

Soft Maple—13 years old; 31 feet in height; 9 inches in diameter.

Balm of Gilead—17 years old; 31 feet in height; 10 inches in diameter; tree unhealthy; utterly worthless for the prairie.

Aspen—18 years old; 31 feet high; 7 inches in diameter.

Ashleaved Maple—9 years old; 28 feet in height; 6½ inches in diameter.

Sycamore—13 years old; 34 feet in height; 11 inches in diameter.

Butternut—13 years old; 31 feet high; 7½ inches in diameter. A rapid growing, healthy, and ornamental tree, valuable for timber and nuts. Should be in every collection.

Black Walnut—17 years old; 41 feet 8 inches in height; 7½ inches in diameter. A healthy, long-lived tree of fair growth.

White Ash—15 years old; 27 feet 6 inches in height; 10 inches in diameter. Last season's top growth, 2 feet 7 inches. A healthy, clean, beautiful tree; excellent for door-yard or lawn; and, for a hard-wood tree, a rapid grower, easy to transplant.

Red Oak—12 years old from the acorn; 25 feet 7 inches in height; 6½ inches in diameter. Healthy, hardy trees, and indispensable on account of the great value of the timber.

Red Cedar—18 years old; 20 feet 5 inches in height; 9 inches in diameter. Valuable as an ornamental tree, for hedges, screens, and wind-breaks. The most lasting post timber we have.

Scotch Pine—16 years old; 28 feet in height; 12½ inches in diameter. A robust, hardy tree of foreign birth, but naturalized to our climate. Considered indispensable in every collection.

White Pine—14 years old; 30 feet 6 inches in height; 11½ inches in diameter. This most valuable tree furnishes nine-tenths of all the timber used in North America, and millions of feet annually for the eastern continent. There is no other soft-wood tree that bears any comparison with it, and, like the walnut, its rapidity of growth seems to increase with age.

The above are trees that were cut down. The following are the measurements of trees that were not cut, and are given in order to make the list more complete:

Norway Spruce—20 years old; 28 feet in height; 14½ inches in diameter.

Balsam Fir—20 years old; 32 feet 6 inches in height; 14 inches in diameter.

American Larch—18 years old; 34 feet in height; 10 inches in diameter.

Hard Maple—13 years planted; 34 feet in height; 10 inches in diameter.

Red Elm—13 years planted; 33 feet in height; 13 inches in diameter.

Mail Contracts.

On the evening of March 9 the business of letting the spring mail contracts throughout the United States was closed at the Postoffice Department. Some idea of this work may be formed as follows: Maine has 221 routes, and 2,800 bids; New Hampshire, 111 routes and 1,400 bids; Vermont, 120 routes and 1,700 bids; Massachusetts, 104 routes and 1,250 bids; Rhode Island, 23 routes and 300 bids; Connecticut, 63 routes and 1,000 bids; New York, 483 routes and 6,500 bids; New Jersey, 1,000 routes and 1,200 bids; Delaware, 22 routes and 300 bids; Pennsylvania, 648 routes and 9,000 bids; Maryland, 133 routes and 2,000 bids; Virginia, 383 routes and 6,000 bids; West Virginia, 205 routes and 3,700 bids. The total number of routes is 2,692, and of bids over 37,000, being nearly 7,000 bids over the number last year.

Foreigners in the Cabinet.

So far as we know only three citizens of foreign birth have ever held Cabinet positions, and these three have justified their appointment by their ability and fidelity. Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury under Washington, and the father of American finance, was born in the West Indies of a Scotch father and a French mother, and was educated in England and France, and his mind fully formed before he came to America. Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury under Jefferson and Madison, and holding the office from 1802 to 1814, was born in Geneva, Switzerland. William J. Duane, Secretary of the Treasury under Jackson, who appointed him in 1833 and removed him the same year, because he refused to change the deposits from the United States Bank, was born an Irishman, but came to this country while yet a child.—Exchange.

Young Statesmen.

The members of the State Government of Illinois are all comparatively young men. Their nativity and ages are as follows: Shelby M. Cullom, Governor, born in Wayne county, Ky., in 1829, is 48 years old. Andrew Shuman, Lieutenant Governor, born in Lancaster county, Pa., in 1830, is 47. George H. Harlow, Secretary of State, born in Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., in 1830, is 47. Edward Rutz, State Treasurer, born in Baden, Germany, in 1828, is 49. Thomas B. Needles, Auditor, born in Monroe county, Ill., in 1835, is 42; J. K. Edsall, Attorney General, born in Windham, Green county, N. Y., in 1831, is 46.

How much may be accomplished by untiring industry is shown by the example of a young man of San Francisco. He went to Virginia City, represented that he was a clergyman, made the acquaintance of thirty persons, borrowed money from each to the aggregate of $1,700, and ran away, all within a week.

MARCH.

Death to King Winter, the cold-blooded tyrant
That held us so long in his iron-bound rule!
We crowned him at Christmas, feasted him New Year,
And drank to his health round the great log of Yule;
But now we have done with our slavish obeisance;
A maiden has risen who conquers his might,
She is coming, our darling, all rosy with sweetness,
To smile at the tyrant and put him to flight.

But see how he blusters in impotent fury,
While earth, though [illegible], still yields to his claim!
Like an insolent bully he swaggers and rages
Against the fair maiden. Old Graybeard, for shame!
Loud are your trumpets and sharp are your weapons;
What do you know of a fair woman's wiles,
The might of her cunning, the strength of her weakness,
Or the summer that lurks in her soft little smiles?

Hearken, O Winter! No prophet is needed—
She'll conquer you first, then she'll weep o'er your bier;
Her tear-drops in falling will bring forth the roses,
And the world will forget that you ever were here.
Ay! riot and rage, for your downfall is coming;
A word in your ear, O my blustering friend—
Your beard [illegible] but [illegible] Spring is a woman,
And the world knows full well how such conflicts all end.

A War Incident.

How it happens that President Hayes is now in possession of two arms is thus related in an Ohio journal: "Gen. Hayes was wounded in the arm at South Mountain. The surgeons said it must come off, and made all necessary preparations for amputation. The General was at Middletown, Md., at the residence of a gentleman well known here, and this gentleman begged him to allow his family physician—Dr. Bare, of Middletown, also well known here—to take charge of him. He consented; and, although the army surgeons were displeased, the doctor assumed the care of the General, and managed the case so skillfully that amputation was rendered unnecessary."

He was struck with the absence of factories, and the amazing abundance of newspapers, and says the people of the West are more liberal, and read more, than those of the East; nearly every passenger on a Western railway train buys a daily paper, "and in the hotels, at breakfast, the array and rustle of newspapers is simply wonderful."

CLARK'S "O. N. T." SPOOL COTTON.

How and Where it is Made—The Clark Thread Company—Largest Works in the New World—Acres of Splendid Buildings—Forests of Wonderful Machinery.

The Process of Manufacture.

Down in the Cotton Fields—The Employes' Societies—The Clark Hose Company—A Grand Relief Society—Employees' Centennial Excursion—The Renowned Eureka Club and Thistle Band.

MANY INTERESTING PARTICULARS.

(From the Essex County Press, Newark, N. J.)

At the foot of Clark street, in the Eighth ward of the city of Newark, on the banks of the Passaic, occupying several acres of ground, upon which are buildings the flooring of which measures nearly eight acres, are situated the largest thread works in the New World, employing about fifteen hundred hands and paying out every two weeks from sixteen to twenty thousand dollars in wages, to be distributed by the employes among different classes and corporations in the city, and from fifteen to twenty thousand per month to other parties here, who, in various ways, are connected with this vast establishment. Although having the largest pay-roll of any employers in New Jersey, and contributing more to the welfare and prosperity of the city than all its financial institutions combined, we hear less in the newspapers of this world of wealth-makers than of some second-class money-lending shop on Broad street. It would be useless for any one to attempt to trace to their source all the varied industries which have entered into the production of Clark's "O. N. T." Spool Cotton, which is [illegible] in dry goods, fancy goods, hosiery, notions, etc., in the United States, and contains two hundred yards of that indispensable article, strong, smooth and beautiful. It is made up of

NEARLY FORTY-TWO MILLION DOUBLINGS,

and yet is so fine as to be hardly visible a few inches from the naked eye. The immense capital invested in The Clark Thread Company's Works, and the vast volume of business, amounting to several millions per annum, extending to every part of the United States, is one of the principal sources of Newark's prosperity. What it is and the blessings which flow from it are not realized by one in a thousand of the people who dwell within the sound of their tower bell. Notwithstanding the large amount of money which the establishment was to pour into the hands of every merchant and trader in the city, as events have shown, the first thing which the City Fathers did when these works were being erected was to tax the bricks and material not yet shaped into buildings. It was on a par with the intelligence and appreciation of the usually exhibited by the average politician. Had it been some trust company or curbstone broker that asked exemption, it would probably have been granted. Some idea of the value of these works to the community may be had by an illustration of a thing which might really happen at any time. The Clark Thread Company employ, as stated, about fifteen hundred persons, paying out to them sixteen to twenty thousand dollars every two weeks. These hundreds of hands pay out that money to the butcher, the baker, the grocer, the clothier, the dry-goods merchant, and all who have anything to sell get a part of it in some way, either directly or indirectly. From their hands it goes to pay debts, meet obligations and fill the channels of trade with the circulating medium called money, and which is to business what blood is to the human system, giving it life, animation and power. Suppose to-night those works were DESTROYED BY FIRE.

REAL SOURCES OF WEALTH,

They are fully insured. The Clark Thread Company receive their insurance in cash from their underwriters. They say to themselves: "Business is dull, sales are uncertain, profits are small, the future is unknown, and our taxes are heavy. The vast business requires close attention and persistent energy. We will not take this money and rebuild the works, but adopt the plan pursued by most moneyed men, viz: go to Washington, buy Government bonds, bring them home, put them in a tin box, pay no taxes, and sit down to take our ease, eat, drink and be merry, with no thought of care, supported in luxury without risk by the interest on our bonds, paid by taxation of the producing classes." Can any man calculate the wide-spread ruin which would follow such a calamity and course of action by The Clark Thread Company? It would be incalculable. All those people who earned money to purchase what they wanted to buy would be added to the list of paupers who to-day clamor for work or bread. Misery, want,

STARVATION AND CRIME

would be the fruit of such a course. But this is exactly what has been done throughout the country, and explains why one in twelve in Newark are to-day supported by the city. The productive capital of the country, which employed our now idle millions, has been put into Government bonds, and appalling destitution and want are on every hand, and increasing at a fearful rate. Labor is the source of all wealth and prosperity, and there is no loss equal to that which follows enforced idleness of the producing classes. There is no music so full of joy and peace and good will to men as the song of labor and the music of machinery. Better far that all other songs be hushed and every note be stilled, rather than those, and to them we now introduce the reader.

ON THE DOCK

of The Clark Thread Company, which is five hundred feet long, is a mountain of two or three thousand tons of coal, drawn out of boats at the wharf by a donkey engine, and the bales of cotton find their way from the same wharf to the brick house for the storage of that precious material, one pound of which will make one hundred miles of thread, containing about forty-two million doublings. The mind cannot grasp the numerical feat. But four grades of cotton are ordinarily used in the manufacture of Clark's "O. N. T." Spool Cotton, and known as "Sea Island Cotton." This comes principally from South Carolina, and is grown on the small islands along the coast. Considerable is raised on the peninsulas and around the bays and inlets, but it is not equal to that of the sea islands, which is the finest in the world. The first bag of this sea island cotton of the crop of 1876 was purchased by the Clark Thread Company at fifty cents per pound. The inland cotton is not used in the manufacture of thread, being too short in the fiber. On these sea islands were the richest planters of the South in many of them having as high as six hundred slaves and compared with whom the feudal lords of England were children in luxury, hospitality and elegance. But to-day all is changed. Those vast estates are cut up into small plantations, many of them owned by the negroes, who now call no man master. They bring in their season's product, sometimes on a mule and again in large quantities. Brokers on the ground or at the landings buy and pay the negroes for their cotton, often dividing the money according to the labor performed in raising the crop. Some lease the land of the former owners, but the old state of things is "dun clar' gone." This trade and traffic, it may be fairly expected, will in a few years largely increase the wealth and intelligence of the race in these localities.

THE OLD SLAVE DAYS,

THE SEA ISLAND COTTON

brings treble the price of inland, and ranges from thirty to ninety cents per pound, according to grade. An acre will produce in the neighborhood of three hundred and fifty pounds of seed cotton, which when ginned weighs about seventy-five pounds, or one to five. The negroes, without doubt, will eventually grow all the cotton, as not one in five of the Northern men have thus far succeeded in their attempts. Let the reader remember that we have not looked at a single piece of machinery yet, and then calculate the number of people and the amount of wealth these works employ and produce, before we reach the factory. The sail, the mine, commerce and manufactures, all find employment to supply The Clark Thread Company's works, and when they stop the cotton may bloom and fall unplucked, the coal miner may starve on a bed of black diamonds, the sails on the rivers be spread to the breeze no more, and the lathes in a hundred [illegible]. The manufacture of Clark's "O. N. T." cotton embraces the island of the sea and penetrates the bowels of the earth, utilizing the treasures of wealth on every hand, enriching and blessing mankind at every step, from the womb of ages to the looms of Newark. We will now examine into the immediate sources of the power which drives the endless machinery of this vast hive of industry, with its sixty miles of belting and about seventy miles of steam pipe for heating purposes.

WE ENTER THE ENGINE HOUSE,

itself large enough for an ordinary factory. Here is a mighty production of human brain and brawn. In the presence of this monster, with its majestic tread, one feels his own insignificance and frailty. This vast piece of machinery, moving silently, save the sharp click of the improved steam cut-offs, is equal in power to the combined draught of six hundred horses, and is two engines in one, usually termed a double engine. The fly-wheel, traveling at the rate of forty-eight revolutions per minute and carrying three huge belts on its surface, each two feet wide, is seventy-eight feet in circumference, twenty-five feet in diameter, and weighs thirty tons, or sixty thousand pounds. The shaft is fourteen inches in thickness, the double cylinders are twenty-six inches in diameter, with condensers, and a stroke of five feet. They were built by Corliss, in 1874. One of the three belts on the fly-wheel is one hundred and fifty feet in length. But even this double monster could not run the works. It has a big twin brother, and together they travel every day for ten hours on their endless journey, and never get tired. They are wonders of power and elegant workmanship, worthy of a visit from any one who wants to see the

BIGGEST PAIR OF TWINS

in New Jersey. They are supplied with steam from nine immense tubular boilers and four large upright boilers, Corliss' plan. They consume twenty-five tons of coal per day, which will give some idea of the amount of steam necessary to drive the immense establishment. Besides these there are three ordinary-sized engines, made by Watts, Campbell & Co., of Newark, in different parts of the works, making seven in all, a grand total of nearly fourteen hundred horse-power. The young mountain of coal, which looks enough to last the whole city a year, is rebuilt by two hundred and fifty ton boat loads, at brief intervals.

MANUFACTURING THE THREAD.

The cotton is brought in bales to the mixing rooms, when it is examined and placed in bins, according to the different grades, ready for the scutching machines, which open and beat the material, cleaning it from the dirt and sand it contains in the bale. After going through the scutching machine, it comes out in the shape of a roll, like wall paper, comparatively soft, white and clean. It is, however, really in a very rough state compared with the fineness and perfection that is to be reached. Several of these scutching machines are running continually, and their sound is like the roar of a lightning express train as it whirls past the platform where you stand. The first scutcher is fed with the bale cotton from a hopper which lets it through into knives set in large rollers, which revolve with tremendous force, and lightning speed, picking the cotton into small pieces, and passing it by suction of air on to other rollers, between which it goes and comes out in the shape of a web or "lap" in large rolls. Four of these rolls are then placed upon a machine like the first and run together through the same process of

PICKING AND BEATING AND CLEANING,

when it comes out again in the same shape as before, rolled to exactly the thickness which it is desired to make the "sliver" from which the thread yarn is to be spun. What a "sliver" is will be learned further on. The machine is so delicately set that it regulates the thickness of the web or lap to within half an ounce, in a web of five feet, weighing only twelve to eighteen ounces. After being put through three scutching machines in this way and coming out with eight thicknesses of web or lap similar to that produced by the first process, it is ready for the carding machines. This department is filled with Carding Machines, Drawing Frames, Lappers, and Combing Machines, a perfect labyrinth of belting, pulleys and machinery, the noise of which is like the roar of many waters mingled with the clatter of a thousand wheels. One of the large rolls of web or lap that came from the last scutching machine is placed on a carding machine, which takes and runs it of a large and small cylinder for the purpose of drawing out the entangled fibers and laying them parallel or in same line of direction and also to remove the small particles or motes which may have escaped the action of the scutching machine. After being treated in this way, a comber or doffer takes the web from the small cylinder, which is now a delicate gauze; and it is gathered up and passed through a small hole, say half an inch in size, after which it is coiled in a revolving can. The whole process is one of wonderful delicacy, the material being so finely worked that a breath of air would break it. This card contains ninety thousand square teeth to a foot, or a total of four million one hundred and eighty-six thousand. On the carding machine is a little joker that works like some old man, raising the wire-covered flats from the teeth of the carder, which it cleans, and throws off the particles of dirt and coarse cotton left on them. Six of the

BETWEEN THE TEETH

TIN CANS, CALLED CARD SLIVERS,

in which the roll is wound are now taken to another machine called a Drawing Frame and run together into one "sliver." These six are so light that when they are passed together through a hole and made one, they fall into another sliver and are then no larger than one of the six from which it was made, although they have not yet been twisted at all. Fourteen of these cans full of slivers are placed at the "Lapper" and run between two rollers, making a new web nine inches wide and half an inch thick, which comes out like the original roll from the scutching machine that takes the cotton from the bales, only that now it is soft and delicate as is possible to conceive, weighing only one hundred and forty-five grains to the yard, nine inches wide. It now goes in rolls to a wonderful little machine, a French invention, first introduced in this country by The Clark Thread Company. It is a refined carding machine, the product of which is as much superior in fineness to the large carders just described as the most elegant silk goods are to

THE COARSEST COTTON CLOTH.

It is called the French combing machine, and is only used by the best thread-makers, as it is very expensive and, while it makes the thread superior in quality, it adds twenty per cent. to the cost of manufacture. Six of the rolls of webbing are now passed together through the combing machine between two rollers, and combed by innumerable steel teeth to the fineness of gossamer and the thinness of a spider's web. It passes on, is gathered into one soft round "sliver" again, goes through rollers once more, when it is coiled into cans as before, with a loss of twenty per cent. on the material which composed the web when it was put on the French machine. It is a texture so fine and soft that one cannot but wonder how it bears its own weight. After the last process, six of the slivers are again put through the drawing frame making one sliver no larger than any of the six from which it is drawn. Then six of these last are put through the same process reducing them in size six times, and adding that to the length. This is repeated three times, and each time they are coiled into cans. The last sliver is the same size and weight as when the process began, although doubled four hundred and thirty-five thousand four hundred and fifty-six times. The last cans are now taken to

THE FIRST SLUBBING FRAME,

from which cans they are passed through rollers, then twisted to about the size of a lead pencil, and wound on bobbins, all by the same machine. From this they go to the second slubbing frame, where one hundred and two spindles on each machine are winding yarn from two hundred and four bobbins, which came from the first slubber, two threads being wound upon one spool. The next, or intermediate, slubbing machine winds upon one hundred and seventy-six spools, from three hundred and fifty-two bobbins, which came from the second slubber. The next and last is called the roving machine, and fills two hundred and forty spools, which came from four hundred and eighty bobbins, from the intermediate slubbing machine. By this repetition of doubling and twisting the yarn is fast becoming strong and hard. We now follow the yarn called "roving" to the self-acting "mule," which makes eight hundred and forty threads of yarn from sixteen hundred and eighty bobbins. This wonderful machine, two of which are operated by one man, draws out the yarn and twists it from sixteen hundred and eighty spools, when it comes away, and on its return winds it on eight hundred cops (spools) making the last number of thread yarn. We now come to which is a distinct and independent department. The cotton yarn comes here, and first goes to the cop of winding machines, where it is run from the cops, through delicate balances, over soft felt ground, upon bobbins, two threads together upon one. From the cop winding department the bobbins go to the slinging department, where the two threads that were run together on the spool, in the cop winding department, are twisted or spun in one thread. The thread, as it is unwound, runs through water, and rapidly over glass guides, and the bobbin which receives it revolves five thousand times per minute, twisting hundreds of threads on each machine. After being twisted two threads together, making one hard thread, three of the latter are again run together on a bobbin, the same as in the first cop winding department. Three of these are now twisted together, making six strands, and is exactly the same as the one last described. It is known as the finishing twisting department. When the thread comes from the finishing twisting department, it is inspected with the greatest care by skillful persons, and put through several tests before passing the reeling department, to be wound in skeins for the bleach-house. The machines in this department are very curious, and daily turn out vast quantities of thread, which is packed, and given a through ticket to the bleach and dye houses. They measure off the thread into skeins of an exact length and size, and when they have reeled off just the right amount of yarn, always stop, and, unlike some kind of yarners, they never forget to tell the same story without variations. Again, after coming from the reels,

THE THREAD MILL,

THE PROCESS OF TWISTING THEM

THE THREAD IS CAREFULLY INSPECTED,

the work employing several girls, who cut all the rough and imperfect thread from the hanks. After this second inspection, we find it next at the bleach house. The bleach and dye houses are among the most interesting departments of this vast establishment, although not the most agreeable. The progress in washing machinery, that is here exhibited, would make our grandmothers think that the millenium had come. The baby washer, as we call it, of this concern, is rather of a large child, whose place and uses will appear later. After the thread is sent from the inspection department to the bleach and dye houses, it is unpacked, counted and put into large tanks, immense loads at a time, and boiled by steam for several hours, which takes out the dirt and

CLEANS IT PERFECTLY.

It is then put through washings oft, and preparations wonderful and curious. The water used, we judge, would have increased the flood just about enough to have lifted Noah's ark from the snag on Mount Ararat. Some of the wash tubs are of stone, and all are on a scale equal in magnitude to any of Col. Sellers' schemes for making millions. The loads of thread are put in and taken out of boilers, rinsers, washers, dryers and half a dozen other processes by machinery. Then after all this it goes right back to those huge steam boilers, and the same thing is done over again. The dry room is heated by seven thousand five hundred feet of steam pipe, and can be regulated to any desired temperature. After leaving the reeling department, the thread that is to be colored goes to the dye house, and that which is to remain white to the bleach house. In the dye house is the patent dyeing machine, used only to dye black. It does the work far better than by hand, and is equal to the labor of more than a dozen men.

ALL COLORS OF THREAD

are made, and the quantities of soaps, dye-stuffs, and other material of the kind used, are immense. Eighty thousand gallons of water are consumed daily in the bleach house alone, and one of the Artesian wells of The Clark Thread Company has a capacity of one hundred and fifty thousand gallons per day. This is a remarkable well, sixteen feet deep and eight feet in diameter, of which Professor Maynard, the New York chemist, said it produced the purest water he ever saw. It makes a man thirsty to look at it, and is absolutely free from any particle of matter, by chemical test. The thread is blued on a big scale, which gives that handsome tint so greatly admired by the ladies. Then it is committed to the tender mercies of the baby washer, which are cruel, and goes through it ten times. The baby is built like an ordinary washing machine, but each of the rollers weighs a thousand pounds, and as the thread passes through the water into the washer and pound with antics queer, but it does the business thoroughly. This was formerly done by the old-fashioned pounder and barrel which our grandmothers used to set us at when we were boys, before going to school in the morning. Then it is drawn through the rinser, which is a simple and novel machine, continually supplied with pure artesian well water. The thread passes over a roller into the water, comes up again over another roller, then down into the water, and up and down, and out and in, and out and up over the reels into great boxes on wheels, from which it is put into a large water extractor, a perforated hollow cylinder, revolving several thousand times per minute, and then it is transported to the drying room. In this way five hundred heads can be rinsed in four minutes, which used to take an hour and a half. After the thread has come out of the drying room,

[illegible]

COLORED OR UNCOLORED,

it goes to the warerooms, where it is counted and put in packages to be given out preparatory to being wound upon spools for the market. The thread having reached this stage of perfection, has become very valuable and is looked after with the greatest care. Tickets direct it to its different departments and denote its size, quality, etc. The inspection and testing of thread is one of the most important features in its production, and it would surprise the lady who sews day after day with Clark's "O. N. T." spool cotton to know by what patient and constant care the perfect smoothness and regularity of the thread was secured. It is now taken to the hank winding department and wound upon large bobbins, when it is ready for its last wind upon the spools, from which it is taken by the consumers for its thousand uses of necessity and utility, from tying the rag on the boy's whittled and bloody finger, to the delicate embroidery of the wedding garment.

THE SPOOLING DEPARTMENT.

The spooling room is a busy place, where spools of thread of all sizes and colors by tens of thousands are wound every day, two hundred yards on a spool. The self-acting spooling machine is a marvelous piece of mechanism. The spools are placed in an iron gutter by the operator, when the machine picks them up, puts them on a shaft eight at a time, winds the thread upon them at the rate of three thousand revolutions per minute, cuts a little slot in the edge of the spool, catches the thread in it, nips it off, drops the spools full of thread into boxes below, picks up eight more empty spools, places, winds and drops them as before, and never makes a mistake. The machine, which is used in this country only by The Clark Thread Company, was exhibited by them at the Centennial, and, with their magnificent case of goods, was one of the great attractions among the many wonders of the exhibition. From the spooling department, the spooled thread is taken to where the beautiful little label containing the name, number, etc., of the thread, is put on by girls. The quickest of them will put labels on the ends of nine or ten thousand in a day, all of which have to be moistened by the tongue, placed on the spool, and then struck with the hand to paste it. Some of these girls work about as quick as lightning. After ticketing, the spools of thread are put into boxes of one dozen each. They are then ready for packing. About twenty-five thousand feet of lumber per month is cut at the mills, in Michigan, to the various lengths required, and all that is done here is to put the boxes together. A private wire runs from the works in Newark to the New York office, and the line is kept busy in sending orders and transmitting messages of the company. In the short time we were there several large orders came in from different parts of the country, and among them were some from Maine, Texas, California, Wisconsin, Oregon, etc. The Clark Thread Company sends out annually vast quantities of show cards, calendars, etc., some of which are magnificent specimens of the lithographic and printer's art.

THE WAREROOM,

IS THIS A FAIR COUNT?

The number of feet of draught which one pound of cotton undergoes is one trillion, seven hundred and seventy-two billion, three hundred and twenty million, six hundred and thirty-five thousand, six hundred feet, or, stated in figures, 1,772,320,635,600, a distance of 335,477,582¾ miles. The following demonstrates the apparently incredible statement: The web of cotton from which this immense length of thread is drawn is forty inches wide. It goes to the carder, where it is drawn to 4x120, equal to 480 feet. Then the drawing frame increases it to 480x6, equal to 2,880; the lapper 2,880x2¼, equal to 6,480; the comber draws it out to 6,480x26, equal to 168,480; then it goes to the first head drawing frame, where 168,480x6 equal to 1,010,880.

THE SECOND DRAWING FRAME

multiplies the last length by six again, making 1,010,880x6 equal to 6,065,280, which repeated on the third drawing frame makes a length of 6,065,280x6 equal to 36,391,680 feet. Now comes the first slubbing frame, where 36,391,680x5 is equal to 181,958,400; the second slubber 181,958,400x4½ equal to 818,812,800; the intermediate slubber 181,958,400x6 equal to 4,612,876,800; the finishing thread winding machine makes the total length of the thread 4,912,876,800x6 equal to 29,477,260,800. Now it goes on bobbins to the "mill," where 29,477,260,800x9¼ gives us 272,664,662,400 feet. We then multiply the last number of feet, which states the total length of one pound of cotton drawn into thread, by the length of the original web, which is six and a half feet, and have the total as stated before, 272,664,662,400x6½ feet, making a grand total of 1,772,320,635,600 feet. The cotton, when finished as yarn, has been doubled six million, nine hundred and sixty-seven thousand, two hundred and ninety-six times(6,967,296), in passing through the different processes. When the yarn is made into six cord finished thread, the above number of doublings have been multiplied by six, making a total of 41,803,762 doublings. Now divide the total draught, 1,772,327,632,600, by the total doublings, and, if the work is correct, we shall have the total number of feet of yarn in a pound of cotton, which is 254,337 feet. But there has been 20 per cent. loss in the manufacture, which must be added, making a total of 305,254 feet of yarn for a pound of cotton, or 120 hanks of 840 yards each, enough to reach from New York to Trenton, a distance of sixty miles.

MACHINE AND CABINET SHOPS, BOX FACTORY AND PRINTING HOUSE.

The Clark Thread Company do all their printing and lithographing at the works here. Four printing presses are kept running all the time, and in the lithograph department one steam press and six or eight hand lithograph presses are continually employed. In both departments the practice of the "art preservative" is in the highest style. Orders for the paper box department in the one item of straw board are given as high as eighty to one hundred tons at a time. In the machine shop a large number of men are employed in making new machinery and keeping in repair the vast quantity in use in the various departments of the works. The cabinet factory turns out about two hundred cabinets per day. The bobbins, etc., used in the mill are made here. In fact about all the Clark Thread Company go outside for is the raw material. They manufacture all they use, except a few of the more intricate or patented machines.

THE CLARK HOSE COMPANY.

One of the best organized and equipped fire companies in the city of Newark is the "Clark Hose Company," organized May 15th, 1869. There are twenty members, employes of the factory, brave, active men, trained by frequent practice to their duty, and proud of their company and outfit. Their equipment is as follows: Two hose carriages with wrenches, bars and axes, carrying seven hundred and fifty feet of hose on reels and two pipes with extra nozzles. They also command nine hundred feet of hose with pipes and nozzles in twenty-one different stations, in and around the factory, one Cameron fire pump, one Worthington, one Watts & Campbell, and one Blake pump, one hundred and seventy-eight filled buckets in their proper places throughout the works, sixteen hand pumps, sprinklers in all the rooms of the cotton mill, the packing house, the machine and carpenter shop and the drying rooms. There are also sprinklers in the two top floors of the thread mill and in the warehouse, and there are thirty-five fire plugs or hydrants on the premises. Regular meetings are held on the second Monday in each month, and practice is had every two weeks. Examination of all valves, hydrants, pumps and other equipments takes place on the first of each month and a minute report of the exact condition, position and effectiveness of the fire service is made to The Clark Thread Company.

THE CLARK THREAD COMPANY'S RELIEF SOCIETY.

One of the best and most beneficial organizations which constitutes a part of the system and care of the Clark Thread Company for their employes, is the Relief Society. It was organized January 22d, 1870, for the purpose of providing a fund for the relief of those who might, by accident or sickness, be incapacitated from sustaining themselves. All the employes of the company must be members of the society, and each recieves assistance when needed, from the fund according to the amount paid in, which must be at least one cent per week, but no one is permitted to pay in an amount which would draw, in case of sickness, more than half their average weekly wages. Every cent paid in draws seventy-five cents per week. The Clark Thread Company contributes five dollars per week to the fund without cessation, but all others cease their contributions when the unexpended balance in the treasury reaches fifteen hundred dollars. When the fund is reduced to seven hundred dollars, payments are renewed. The payments into the treasury average about nine months in the year. We hope that this humane and systematic organization may find many imitators among the manufacturers of Newark and throughout the country, who read this article. The company pays interest at seven per cent. on the money in the treasury, besides their five dollars per week into the fund. Since its organization one thousand three hundred and ninety-seven members have been relieved, and twenty-four deaths have occurred in the society. The reason that the receipts for 1874 and 1876 are less than usual is because the fund had reached the maximum of $1,500, and payments were stopped. The following very interesting table shows the amount received and paid out from 1870 to 1876 inclusive:

Years.	Receipts.	Payments.
1870	$1,743.84	$1,804.29
1871	2,247.98	2,010.82
1872	2,114.42	1,704.88
1873	2,891.57	1,742.21
1874	856.60	1,895.59
1875	1,841.01	1,624.75

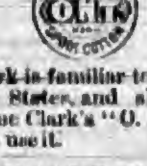
HOW CLARK'S "O. N. T." SPOOL COTTON ORIGINATED.

Until within a few years, the great difficulty to be overcome in the introduction of sewing machines was the objections made by manufacturers and operators to the then popular threads. Those complaints were so loud and well founded that the sale of sewing machines was greatly impeded on account of the impossibility of obtaining a thread adapted to their use. Mr. George A. Clark, appreciating the difficulty, introduced into the American market the now famous Clark's "O. N. T." Spool Cotton, all numbers being six cord, from 8 to 100, which met the demand, did away with all complaints, and long since established its reputation as the best thread in use for sewing-machines or hand sewing. To Mr. George A. Clark belongs the credit of being the first to supply those fine qualities of Six-Cord Spool Cotton with which his name is associated. The thread is used and recommended by agents of the Singer, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Domestic, Howe, Florence, Weed, Wilson, Blees, Remington, Secor, Home, Lathrop and other sewing machine companies. The superior quality of Clark's "O. N. T." Spool Cotton soon secured for it an immense sale, but with the great popularity of the goods came also counterfeits which made it necessary for the manufacturers to adopt a trade mark for their own and the public's protection, and now upon every genuine spool of their thread is the following:



The trademark is familiar to every merchant in the United States, and all who have ever tried the genuine Clark's "O. N. T." Spool Cotton continue to use it.

EMPLOYES AT THE CENTENNIAL.

A noticeable feature of The Clark Thread Company has always been their thoughtful and considerate attention to the welfare and pleasure of their employes. The Centennial Exhibition afforded an opportunity for its practical illustration which should not pass unnoticed in this article. Desiring to give all their operatives an opportunity to witness the great Exhibition at Philadelphia of what the nation had accomplished during the first hundred years of its existence in industry and art, the company planned and carried to complete success a monster excursion to Philadelphia, which embraced their fifteen hundred employes, with invited guests, members of the press, and the Mayor and Common Council of the city of Newark. Some idea of its extent may be gained when it is known that forty-five railroad coaches were employed for their accommodation, and the cost for transportation, admission, entertainment, etc., exceeded six thousand dollars. But this large sum is small compared with the unalloyed pleasure which was afforded the grand army of industrious people who find employment at the Clark Thread Company Works in Newark. The Common Council passed and caused to be beautifully engrossed and presented to the Company a series of resolutions, from which, for lack of space, we copy only the following extract:

"Resolved, That we witnessed with great satisfaction the kindness and attention shown by the officers of this Company to their fifteen hundred working people and the evident good feeling that exists between them; recognizing that, when labor and capital thus harmonize, prosperity must ensue.

"Resolved, That the location of the CLARK THREAD COMPANY in our city, with their immense works and their army of operatives, has proved a vast benefit, and that Newark is and should be, justly proud of her manufactures on which her growth and prosperity must ever depend, and that this municipality should foster and encourage by every proper means their establishment and success.

"Resolutions of thanks to the company were also passed by the employes."

THE EUREKA BOAT CLUB AND THISTLE BAND.

The now famous crew, which came so near winning the prize against the world at the Centennial International Regatta last August, is from The Clark Thread Company's Works principally. It has a list of thirty-five active and about forty honorary members. It is the champion crew of the Passaic, and has beaten the celebrated Atlantic crew of New York. They won the first heat on Monday, August 28th, 1876, at Philadelphia, beating the Dublin and Argonauta crews. On the second day they were beaten by the celebrated Beaverwycks, of Albany, by only six seconds, the Beaverwycks winning the championship of the world on the last day, the Newark boys of The Clark Thread Company coming very close to the championship of the world.

The Thistle Band, one of the best in the State, is organized from the employes of the company and plays for all the many excursions and festivals of the employes, besides answering outside calls when made. They accompanied the Eurekas to Philadelphia, and also the grand excursion of the employes to the Centennial last year, and always play at all the regattas in which the Eurekas take part.

THE NEW YORK BRANCH.

At No. 400 Broadway, corner of Walker street, New York, is the splendid marble building of George A. Clark & Brother, the selling agents of The Clark Thread Company. The entire five stories of their magnificent place are fitted up with every facility possible for the prompt transaction of their immense business.

About Foreigners.

A correspondent writes to know something about the distribution of the foreign population in this country, more especially the Irish and Germans.

There has been no census since 1870, so that the present exact condition of the various nationalities, as to numbers, is unknown. Such information as was obtained then is all that is available at the present time. In 1870, the States having a population of foreign birth [illegible] were as follows:

California	209,831
Illinois	515,198
New York	1,138,353
Iowa	204,692
Massachusetts	353,319
Michigan	268,010
Missouri	[illegible]
Ohio	372,493
Pennsylvania	545,309
Wisconsin	[illegible]

In all, these States have over 3,000,000. As to Germans and Irish, there are several States having over 100,000 of one or the other or both of these nationalities, as follows:

State.	Irish.	German.
Illinois	120,162	203,758
Massachusetts	216,120	13,072
Missouri	54,983	113,618
New York	528,806	316,902
Ohio	82,674	182,897
Pennsylvania	235,798	160,146
Wisconsin	48,479	162,314

From this statement it will be seen that the Irish predominate in Massachusetts, New York and Pennsylvania; and the Germans in Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri and Ohio. In Illinois there are, or were in 1870, nearly twice as many Germans as Irish, while in Wisconsin the former outnumber the latter nearly four to one. Since the census was taken in 1870, the ratio of the two nationalities has not greatly changed. Among both immigration has fallen off largely, and, if there be any difference, it is in favor of the Germans. Not only has immigration fallen off from Germany, but there has been a very respectable emigration thither from the United States.—Chicago Times.

"Go in and Holler, Then."

At a recent meeting of the Detroit Temperance Reform Club, one of the speakers explained the cause of his presence by relating the following incident: When Phil. Sheridan was riding down the Shenandoah valley to check the progress of Early and his men he met a soldier on the retreat and asked him why he was going to the rear. The private answered that his musket would not go off. "Go in and holler, then," said the General. At this juncture some one in the rear of the hall near the door did "holler" "Fire!" In an instant the vast audience were upon their feet and a rush for the door was instituted. Several gentlemen upon the stage tried to quiet the fears of the people, but without avail, and for a few seconds it seemed as though a terrible stampede would ensue. At this critical period President Duffield leaped from the private box in which he was seated to the stage, and, with a nod to the choir and organist, asked them to lead the audience in singing "Hold the Fort." Without prelude and hardly waiting for the key note the choir began, and the audience joined in loud voices singing the glorious hymn. The first strain had not been finished before the frightened persons paused, and soon all evidence of alarm had subsided in an apparent general desire to join, heart and soul, in the singing. In this way was quiet restored and the exercises proceeded.

Didn't See Any.

A stranger yesterday called upon the Chief of Police to tell a little story. When told to go ahead, he pointed to his buttonless coat and said:

"If a fellow falls asleep in a saloon, and some one cuts the buttons off his coat, is that a joke?"

The Chief didn't see any joke in that, and the man pointed to his boots and continued:

"If a feller falls asleep in a saloon, and some one paints one of his boots red and the other blue, is that a joke?"

The Chief looked down at the novel "shine" and remarked that the boots should have been tipped with white to make a patriotic job of it.

"If a feller falls asleep in a saloon," continued the man, "and some one cuts off half of his goatee, pours varnish into his overcoat-pockets, and cuts a hole in the top of his plug-hat, is that any joke?"

The Chief said he didn't see any joke in that; but the stranger's countenance suddenly melted, and he chuckled as if greatly pleased as he remarked:

"The joke is on the saloon! The fools thought I was asleep, but I wasn't. I was awake all the time—ha! ha! ha! Don't you see the joke now?"

The Chief didn't see it, but the stranger laughed all the way out of the City Hall and down to the gate.—Detroit Free Press.

The Wonders of Blue Glass.

In Detroit the gamins discuss the blue-glass cure with all the philosophy of veteran college professors. According to the Free Press of that city where "Bijah" dwells, "Harky," the apple boy who feeds the lawyers, may be heard at the head of a flight of stairs chanting away on:

> These Northern Spies delight the eyes,
> But blue glass does the biz;
> We've got a winder full at home
> To cure our rheumatiz.

Jack Shepard looks as wicked as ever, but his voice is gentle as he warbles:

> The old woman, her bones did ache,
> For many and many a year,
> But blue glass came, with all its fame,
> And now she's tough as a bear.

Little Stonewall Jackson sings as he puts the shine on a boot, and he sings as follows:

> She sat beside a blue-glass pane
> To cure her pal-pi-tation;
> The sun came in and burned her ear,
> And now she's all vex-a-tion.

While Thomas Henry Jackson is not entirely skeptical as to the cure, he may be heard any afternoon singing, as he parades Griswold street:

> Oh, the bluest thing that I do know
> Is a big blue bag of indigo;
> Around my neck I'll hang one, sure,
> And beat you folks on a blue-glass cure.

Civil Service Reform—Schurz appointing the wife of Avery, the whisky thief, to a $1,200 clerkship in the Interior Department.

Ex-Gov. Pinchback has been expelled from the Republican Central Committee of the State of Louisiana because he declared, that Tilden had honestly and squarely carried the State. The Ex-Governor regards his expulsion with the [illegible]

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican says that—

"Lugubrious folks, who are sure the world is growing worse all the while, had better read the speech in which Democratic Senator Morgan, of Alabama, indorsed the appointment of Fred Douglass."

And meanwhile they should remember that the opposition to the confirmation of the appointment of Fred Douglass was chiefly Repulican.

Supposing Tilden had been inaugurated, what would our Radical friends have said had he appointed an ex-confederate general to a cabinet position? We see no harm in it, but would they have been satisfied? Hays' Postmaster General is an ex-confederate general, and you should have heard Bob Ingersol, last fall, picture out the killing of union soldiers, by such men as Key, but now that he is appointed by Hayes its all right. This only shows how insincere they are when they come before the people.

In New Hampshire the constitution adopted in 1784 and amended in 1792, is still the fundemental law. According to this instument only Protestents can vote for or hold the offices of the Governor or legislator, and Catholics are are not allowed to hold any position in public schools. In the late election, it was proposed to abolish this law. But, no, New Hampshire is joined to her idols, and a free man, if a Catholic, cannot vote. And yet there are Catholics favoring this disfranchisment indirectly by supporting the party that favors it.

The Rochester Sentinel, in speaking of Richard M. Thompson, the new Secretary of the Navy, says he thoroughly understands the meaning of "ge," "haw," and "whoa," but the new terms of "port" and "starboard," compel him to "haul down" his "mainstay" and take a "trip" through Webster's unabridged "stand by," that he may pass the "Keys" in safety. His ideas of naval affairs is supposed to equal that of a canal cook. When Dick first boarded a man-of-war at the Gosport Navy yard, he paused before the hatchway, gave a startled glance downward and exclaimed: "Great Ceasar's ghost! if the d—d thing isn't hollow!"

How the counting in of Hayes by a patent and shameless fraud is viewed by European Republicans is strikingly set forth in a private letter which the New York World says was received in that city on Saturday from a most intelligent French citizen, long a resident of New York and now living in close personal relations with many of the leaders of the Republican party in France:

"You can not realize," says this gentleman, writing to an American friend, "the effect throughout Europe of the decision in the matter of the Louisiana election! The enemies of democratic institutions are jubilant, while honest Republicans are stricken with consternation. So far as I am concerned I avoid them for I find nothing whatever to say in reply to their, alas! too cogent questions. How on earth could the Democrats be so innocent as to imagine that there were in the Republican eight men who could ever give a decision contrary to the interest of their party? And how could the managers of the Democratic party vote for a bill which did not impose the necessity of going back of the returns? If, on the other hand, it was implied that such would be the case, it was clearly the duty of the seven Democratic umpires to withdraw from the Commission the moment the majority decided that no investigation would be instituted. For all men of sense and honesty must unquestionably have believed that the Commission had been created especially for that purpose and for nothing else."

The Indiana National Bank of Indianapolis was robbed last week of $27,000. A curly headed fellow entered the front door of the bank with a box in his hands. The customers were all out. The president Mr. Tousey, and the paying teller, Mr. James Nichol, were in the back room. George Tousey, Jr., was standing at the back door, ready to step out. Mr. Taylor, the cashier, was sitting down besides the stove warming his feet. Ed. Mason the messenger, was sitting near reading a paper, and J. J. Blythe, the book-keeper, had stepped to another desk and was busily engaged upon the books just at the time. The stranger laid his package upon the floor very carefuly as if it contained nitro-glcerine, and suddenly stepping upon it he deliberately reached over the railing and scooped up in his arms several rolls of bills amounting to over $25,000. The moment his head was over the railing, and while in the act of taking the money, Mason saw him, but before he could reach him he had stepped down from his stool and was making for the door. Mason vaulted the counter and sprang after him. He was not ten feet behind him, with every show of catching him, when the fugitive slamed the door in his face and escaped.

Hayes Backing Down.

We did hope Hayes was man enough to stand by his guns, and carry out his policy as declared in his inaugural, and foreshadowed by Foster, of Ohio. He assumed the responsibility of President under the most corrupt circumstances, and now he lacks the backbone to discharge his duties. Somebody was elected Governor in Louisiana, just as sure as there were electors elected. The election was good enough to count in Hayes, but now he wants to avoid the responsibility of his office, by sending a commission to Louisiana to make a bargain with the two contending factions. If Hayes was elected, so was Packard for the latter had a thousand more majority than Hayes. But the President was very patriotic on the outstart, and wanted to conciliate the South, and knowing that the great mass of the people stood by Nicholls, he was inclined to favor him. Packard couldn't see it and threatened war, and the President had to come down, and now proposes a commission to do the work he should do himself. For four weeks Hayes has been president and what has he done outside of promises? Our republican friends can begin to have an idea of what kind of a man they have elected president. Blaine was down a few days ago but his side appears to be coming up.

Explorers Wanted in Politics.

On the Fourth day of March instant a man name Hayes became de facto President of the United States. The manner of his coming into office was unprecedented, and was so clearly illegal that two of the most highly esteemed members of Congress in his own party, Messrs. Seelye and Pierce of Massachusetts, entered their solemn protest against it, and a majority of the House condemned it by resolution. But the promises of the man were so fair that many easily persuaded and unreflecting persons thought they served in some degree to lighten the cloud that rested on his title. A new policy was to be introduced. Peace and plenty were to fill the land. The common mind accepted the idea of the new policy as something devoutly to be desired. Merchants held meetings and adopted approving resolutions. Political clubs did the same. The newspaper press very generally commended in. We ourselves could not deny that grass had grown greener since the Fourth of March; that the geese had begun to fly northward, showing increase confidence in the weather, and we are prepared to hear from the south side of Long Island that eeling was better.

But now the question arises, What is this new policy? Mr Hayes evidently does not know. The members of his Cabinet do not know. Nobody knows. Some enterprising political explorers ought to be appointed to see if they can find out.[Sun.]

The Latest Out.

The Ladies' Friend, a new carpet sweeper, patented Feb. 1877, the easiest and most perfect made. We have tried one and would not part with it. Go to Forkner & Co.'s, New York Store, see sample and order one. J. C. Gonter, of Ontario, Lagrange Co. is the agent for DeKalb Co. n13 3w.

An old superstition says that "a ring made from the hoof of an ass's right fore foot is a good amulet to shield the wearer from impending danger." The ring made by a mule's right hind foot depends upon whether it is imprinted as to whether it is dangerous or not.

A faint whisper came to us the other day of a story about a young lady of this county, who had two lovers, a farmer and a certain runner from the east. The farmer met his rival on the highway one dark night and attacked him with a knife, but the lady rushed between them and prevented bloodshed. Rusticus sulked on his farm for a day or two, and then challenged his rival to meet him and fight it out. It was done a week ago Wednesday in a ten acre lot. Not with pistols nor shot-guns, but with fists, a mutual friend sitting on a fence near by, and by means of a revolver enforcing fair play. After a rough-and-tumble fight, lasting three-quarters of an hour, the country lover cried "enough!" The mutual friend made out a certificate of the result, behind which the young lady, as there was no double returned, refused to go, and the salesman was duly awarded the prize. There was no cloud on his title.

Scarcity of Money.

There is no doubt but the present condition of all kinds of business and industry is fearfully depressed, and it behooved every family to look carefully to their expenses. Spring is coming on when children are liable to Croup, Whooping Cough, etc. Coughs and Colds will prevail everywhere, and Consumption, with other throat and lung diseases, will carry off many.—These diseases should not be neglected. Doctor's bills are expensive, and we would advise our people to use Boschee's German Syrup. It never has failed. One bottle at 75 cents will keep your whole family well during the winter. Two doses will relieve any case. Sold in all towns in the United States, and by your druggist F. E. Davenport.

But early to Ryes, and tardy to bed,
Makes a man's nose turn a cardinal red.

With increasing cold weather come those dreadful Coughs and Colds, which are so easily and effectually cured with Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup. It is always warrented to give satisfaction. For sale by F. E. Davenport.

FRUIT HOUSE PRICES.

No dull times with us---Our trade continually on he increase.

No secret about it, simply purchasing our goods in large quantities of first hands and selling direct to our customers at a small profit, thereby saving them the profits of the middle men which adds 15 to 20 per cent. ; even forty per cent on some goods. This saving we are bound to give to our customers.

Take tea for instance: The advance on that article from the time it arrives in New and is sold to the speculator, and from him to the jobber, and from the jobber to the whosale grocer, and from the wholesale grocer to the retail dealer, is at least 30 per cent. As each of these dealers has to make his 5 to 10 per cent. on the sale, and then the retailer, he must have his profit, and by the time it reaches the consumer there is at least 50 per cent added to it. We cut all these off by ordering direct from the importer and selling direct to the consumer. When we first commenced our trade was two chests a month and now it is as many chests a day. So with all other goods, Sugars, Coffees, Tobaccoes, Fish, Spice or anything we deal in, we purchase at the first hands and resell direct to the consumer and save the profits of the middle dealers.

We are in some doubt as to wether we should remind a few of our readers that they are behind on their subscription to the COURIER, because some of our subscribers, who are always prompt paying, get an idea we mean them when we do not. Somebody has played a naughty trick on Miss F., of Jackson township. The Clerk has been notified that should license to marry be asked of him in which the name of this young lady might appear, he must demand proof of age. And this is what's called a free country. Out upon such partiality. When a young girl wants to get married, its a great shame for the remorseless law to step in and say wait a little longer.

A. J. Little, Jr., of the COURIER, while drinking some water, one day this week swallowed a huge spider. All attempts to extricate said spider proved useless, untill an idea struck the Devil. After some trouble said Devil secured a green bottle-fly and held it to the mouth of his patient, whereupon Mr. Spider thinking of the good chance to secure a feast, started after the fly and was instantly caught in the massive jaws of the sufferer. All is well that ends well.

Great heavens! ladies, see what this Hayes administration is about to inflict. Demorests monthly says, word comes to us of a recent contrivance of the "modistes," by which the long trains and collant dresses are to be retained in position. A strong elastic is attached to a garter, just above the knee, carried over and fasten to the other; thus the length of the steps taken by wearer is regulated, and the classical folds of the dress remain undisturbed. We have seen horses and mules kept in pastures by hobbling them, and now it is adopted to bar the gait of women. The next we will hear on the streets will be "go slow, don't push."

Dr. Mercer, our State Senator, claims some credit for voting against the bill for a new State House. Well, perhaps there were some good men in that body opposed to it, but how a fair, intelligent person, passing through a session in the old dilapidated rat trap, now in existance, does not appear. There isn't a representative tax-payer in the county, knowing its terrible condition, but what would favor a new one. Its a disgrace to the State, and rooms have to be rented outside to facilitate state business. If we are a penurious, stingy people in this county, then the Doctor has represented us correctly.

Farewell Donation.

We feel assured our citizens generally will recognize the many virtues of one who has labored zealously in the many interests of our city, show their appreciation by their generous patronage of the maple sugar festival to be given at M. E. Church next Monday evening, for the benefit of the retiring pastor. Three years uninterupted labor, an indefatigable effort to bring about a better condition of things, and an unceasing interest in everything pertaining to our general welfare, has endeared him to all. Almost ubiquitous, at the right [illegible] right time, through sunshine and storm, he has never wearied, but with stout heart and willing hand, he has led the work with a master spirit. He leaves us in a few days. Is it not meet to gather on this festive occasion, and tender him a generous, a substantial farewell. The ladies will make it interesting for all in the way of refreshments and it will be the occasion of a happy commingling of a grateful people. In view of his early departure from this field of labor, the committee is desirous of making this occasion a social and enjoyable one, in which all are cordially invited to participate, and bring with them such articles as they desire to contribute, consisting of dry goods, groceries, provisions, money, &c all of which will be thankfully received. The young ladies will have on hand a full supply of maple sugar, to be served in different styles as desired, also sweet meats, social converse, music, &c., will be the order of the evening. Come one, come all and spend the evening with us.
By order of the COMMITTEE.

While our spellers are busy getting off hard words, supposing they learn to pronounce as they go. Below we give a paragraph and you will percieve that it is composed of comman ordinary words. Now, we'll bet our hat there is not one in the county who can pronounce every word correctly, according to Webster without looking at the dictionary. Here it is:

A representative of the COURIER an Italian with italics, began an address or recitative as to the mischievous national finances. His dolorous progress was demonstrated by a demonstration, and the preface to his sacerdotal profile gave his opponents an irreparable and lamentable wound. He was deaf and isolated, and the envelope on the furniture at the depot was a covert for leisure and reticence from the first gasp of the dancing legislature of France. The situation of the chasm or trough made the servile satyr and virile optimist vehemently panegyrize the lenient God. He was an aspirant after the vagaries of the exorcists, and an inexorable coadjutor of the irrefragable yet exquisite farrago, on the subsidence of the despicable finale and the recognition of the recognizance.

That Spellin' Skule.

Quite a large number were present at the spelling last Friday night at Ensley's Hall, though the number entering the class for the prize was somewhat limited. After some little delay at the start a class was formed and the work commenced, though it was not a spirited contest, by any means. We don't like to see prizes carried off without some effort, whether in a horse race, climbing the greased pole, or spelling twisty words. There was not a dozen difficult words spelled, and the victory was as easy as falling off a log. Frank went down on "Freedom;" Mrs. Zeigler had a severe attack of "typhus," and it was fun to see Al Robbins "rarefy." A wonderful "heresy" siezed Mike Long, and Shaub made an "acknowledgment" that was startling, while Hank Shull at the "schism," quit like a steer. Nelson Shatton, of Fairfield township, took the ten dollar gold piece, instead of the book. If he had been a good Sunday School boy, he would have taken the book. A friend hands us the following ing which will be found apropos:

Stand up, ye spellers, now and spell—
Since spelling-matches are the rage—
Spell Phenakistoscope and Knell,
Diphthera, Syzygy, and Gauge.
Or take some simple word, as Chilly,
Or Willie, or the garden Lily.
To spell such words as syllogism,
And Lachrymose and Synchronism,
And Pentateuch and Saccharine,
Apocrypha and Celandine,
Lactiferous and Cecity
Jejune and Homeopathy,
Paralysis and Chloroform,
Rhinoceros and Pachyderm,
Metempsychois, Gherkins, Basque,
Is certainly no easy task.
Kaleidoscope and Tennessee,
Kamtschatka and Dispensary,
Would make some spellers colicky.
Diphthong and Erysipelas,
And Etiquette and Sassafras,
Infallible and Ptyalism,
Allopathy and Rheumatism,
And Cataclysm and Beleaguer,
Twelfth, Rendezvous, Intiguer.
And hosts of other words are found,
On English and on classic ground,
Thus Behring's Straits and Michealmas,
Thermopylæ, Cordilleras,
Fuite, Jalap, Hemorrhage, and Havana,
Cinquefoil and Ipecacuanha,
And Rappahannock, Shenandoah,
And Schuylkill, and a thousand more.
Are woods some prime good spellers miss,
In dictionary lands like this.
Nor need one think himself a Scroyle
If some of these his efforts foil,
Nor think himself undone forever,
To miss the name of either river,
The Dneiper, Seine, or Guadalquiver.

Almost a Tragedy.

A fellow by the name of Kennedy, lives with two sisters, on Main street, opposite the residence of Mr. Little. One of these sisters is in the employ of Henry Ford, Esq. Tuesday night about 12 o'clock the other sister came to Ford's and asked her sister to come home as her brother was sick. She got up and went with her, but soon returned telling Mr. Ford to come over as her brother had a fit. He got up and went over to the house, and saw bedding and other articles lying outside by the door. He called Mr. Anderson, and they waited [illegible] Kennedy flourishing an axe. The girls ran to Ford's house and the men followed, Kennedy still pursuing. Anderson and the girls got on the inside and bolted the door, and when Mr. Ford came up he could not get in. The fellow was close upon him, and dodging under the up-lifted axe, he made for the stable to get a fork, as he could obtain no club, everything being frozen up. While he was trying to get into the stable, he heard the fellow demolishing the doors, and when he got back, Ken. was on the landing of the stairs, up which the ladies had escaped, determined to kill them. Hank saw he must do something quick, or he would carry out his intention. So he bantered him to come down as he could thrash him, even with his axe, and the fellow responded, came down and followed him, out on Main street, and by clever maneuvering, Hank saw a chance to get back to the house to which Knenedy had began to retrace his steps. Mr. Ford reached the house first, opened a window and got his gun, and shot Kennedy in the foot, and finally made him drop the axe when he was taken to jail.

There is some mystery about the affair, as Kennedy has been known heretofore as a quiet man. He broke in several doors in the scrimmage, and his manner was terrifying in the extreme. When asked afterwards what he intended to do when he went up stairs, he said, he wanted to kill the women. Though he drinks sometimes, he is not generally dissipated. His sister heard him make a strange noise that night, and went to his bed and asked him what was the matter, when he jumped up and swore he would kill her. The Prosecutor was sent for, and a trial will be had perhaps to-day.

LATER.—Since the above was in type, the cause of Kennedy's murderous acts has been established. He ate his supper last night apparently as well as any time during the day, when at 10 o'clock he was taken with a fit, coming out of that and immediately going into another and continuing so until 6 o'clock this morning when he died having had thirty-five fits during the night.

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

SECRETARY McCRARY has issued the following circular in regard to removals, promotions, etc. in the War Department: "The civil employes now in the service of the United States under the War Department are hereby informed that hereafter removals will be made in this department for cause only, and promotions will be ordered upon the sole ground of merit. Every official must understand that retention and advancement in the service will depend upon a record of good behavior and efficiency and not upon external influence. No political test is required beyond an earnest support of the constitution and its amendments; and a proper respect for the rights of citizens guaranteed thereby, industry and faithfulness in the discharge of duty, a good moral character, and strictly temperate habits will be required and enforced, and heads of bureaus will report promptly any case of idleness, neglect of duty, incapacity, drunkenness, or any immoral or dishonest conduct. In case of vacancy, report thereof will be made, accompanied by a list of all the most reliable and efficient clerks in the same office, division, or bureau, from which list the vacancy shall be filled."

THE EAST.

PETER B. SWEENEY, whose name was associated with Boss Tweed in the great ring swindles, and who has been an exile for the past five years, has returned to New York city. He has not been taken into custody, because it was arranged with the Attorney General that if he would return and be present at the trial against him, all proceedings, civil and criminal, so far as arresting him, should be suspended during the trial and for thirty days afterward.... Thomas W. Thompson, of Westfield, N. Y., has been arrested and held for trial on a charge of using the mails to fraudulently obtain money from relatives of deceased parties of the late Ashtabula disaster, his modus operandi being to write to relatives of deceased friends stating he had in his possession certain articles belonging to deceased, and upon receipt of stipulated sums would forward the articles named, signing his name "Victor Bennett." The prisoner offered no defense, pleading guilty to the charge.

EX-GOV. EMORY WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, is dead.... The Red Star Line steamer Rusland, from Antwerp for New York, went ashore on the New Jersey coast, at Long Branch, one night last week. By the heroic exertions of the life-saving crew stationed there, all the passengers and crew were rescued.... A fire at Pittsburgh, last week, destroyed the boiler works of D. W. C. Carroll & Co. Loss, $175,000.

A FORGER of railroad bonds, named James Kirkpatrick, has been arrested in New York with $100,000 worth of spurious Missouri Pacific bonds. They are said to be an almost perfect imitation of the genuine bonds.... A. Oakey Hall, ex-Mayor of New York, and for many years one of the most noted men in the metropolis, has mysteriously disappeared. His friends believe that he has either been murdered or has committed suicide, as it is said his mental faculties have lately shown symptoms of failing. Another theory is that Mr. Hall has sailed for Europe to escape testifying against his old friend Peter B. Sweeney, for whom he has a warm regard.

THE WEST.

CONGRESSMAN CHARLES H. MORGAN, of the Sixth District of Missouri, was married a few days ago, at Oshkosh, Wis., to Miss Clara Washburne, a daughter of Judge Washburn, of that city.... Harrison B. The boiler in Hunter Brothers, saw-mill, at Washington, Ind., exploded the other day, instantly killing two of the Hunter brothers, two brothers named Bender, and one, name unknown. Several others were dangerously wounded.

THE recent massacre of a party of inoffensive Chinese at Chico, Cal., brief mention of which was made in these columns, has been productive of a vast deal of excitement thereabouts. The citizens of the town have received threatening letters from anonymous sources ordering them to discharge their Chinese help or suffer the consequences, and officers have been warned that death will be their portion if they attempt to discover who killed the Chinamen. Rewards aggregating $3,500 have been offered for the arrest of the assassins. Altogether it is a very ugly affair, and has created a general sensation all over the Pacific coast country.

DAILY mails will soon be sent to the Black Hills. Postmasters have been regularly commissioned at Deadwood and Custer, and as soon as the roads are passable the service will begin. ....William Hayes, a prominent lawyer of San Francisco, entered the room of the managing editor of the Alta California, Gen. John McComb, and demanded a retraction of an article published in the Alta, threatening in case of a refusal to shoot him. McComb knocked him down, chastised him severely, took away his pistol, and took him to the station-house, where a charge of assault with a deadly weapon was entered against him. ....Arrangements have been made for the immediate survey of a railroad route connecting the Union Pacific with the heart of the Black Hills gold region.

HON. ALBERT HAINES, a member of the Ohio Senate from Preble county, met his death accidentally by falling down a stairway at his boarding-house in Columbus, Ohio, last week.

A BOLD robbery was perpetrated at Indianapolis, one day last week. A thief entered the Indiana National Bank at midday, when most of the employes were absent, placed a small dry-goods box on the floor, stood upon it, and, deliberately reaching over the counter to the money table, grabbed several piles of bills, amounting to $26,700. Six officers and employes of the bank were in the room at the time, but they were in the rear, and, although seeing the man, appeared to be dazed by the boldness of his operations. The porter jumped over the counter and pursued the thief, but in the confusion he darted up a rear stairway and disappeared in an alley, and up to last accounts had not been arrested.

THE Ponca Indians object to the proposed removal of their tribe to the Indian Territory. They say they will fight before they will leave. ....Advices from the West state that Gen. Miles is getting ready for an active campaign against the hostile Indians.

WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON dispatches inform us that serious charges of frauds upon the treasury have been brought against certain officials in that department. Their plan of proceeding seems to have been this: The Treasury Department would purchase a quantity of registered bonds on the market and place them in the Treasury Department. They then belonged to the Government. Assistant Treasurer Charles F. Conant, Daniel Baker, and Mr. Bigelow, clerks, were cognizant of these transactions, and formed a ring to profit by them. They took the number of the bonds and the names in which they were registered, and furnished these to a New York speculator named William Howe, who prepared bogus powers of attorney and collected the accrued interest from the department, after sharing it with Conant, Bigelow [illegible] named Springer, the sixth insane person who has gone to Washington to be inaugurated President, has just been committed to the lunatic asylum.

IT is given out in Washington that an extra session of Congress will be convened about the middle of May.... Chief Justice Cartter has kicked the mule case against Gen. Bristow out of his court.... Clerk Adams says that, conceding Republicans all they really claim, there will be a Democratic majority on the roll of the next House of three.

A WASHINGTON dispatch says: "The Republicans claim with great confidence that they will be able to organize the next House and make Foster, of Ohio, Speaker. This, they say, is part of the agreement made with the Southern members, who are willing to sacrifice everything to secure their State Governments. ... J. W. Marshall, First Assistant Postmaster General, has been appointed Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, with headquarters in Washington.

THE President has completed the commission for the purpose of investigating the ravages of grasshoppers in the Western States. It consists of Prof. C. V. Riley, State Entomologist of Missouri; Prof. Cyrus Thomas, State Entomologist of Illinois, and Prof. A. S. Packard, of Salem, Mass. The commission is spoken of by those interested in its work as an exceedingly able body.

SEVERAL Cabinet meetings were held last week, the greater portion of the time of each being devoted to the consideration of the Louisiana question. After discussing the question in all its bearings, and considering all the information that has been furnished the President by the agents of the Governors relative thereto, it was finally concluded to send a commission to New Orleans, and to await its report before disturbing the present status of affairs there. It is reported that there was some difference of opinion as to the wisdom of immediately ordering the United States troops away from the vicinity of the State House in New Orleans, although there was none as to the general details of the President's policy, and, after a full consultation and a vote, in which Messrs Evarts, Schurz, and Key favored the immediate withdrawal of troops, it was the unanimous opinion that the commission plan was the best.... Justice Clifford says he has no intention of resigning his position on the bench of the Supreme Court.

THE Army Board of Engineers, consisting of Gens. Duane, Wright and Gillman, who were ordered to examine the Washington monument and the foundation upon which it is built, after a careful examination of the work done, and the strata beneath the foundation, have ordered the work to cease. All the members agreed that the monument could not be completed according to the regular design, because the formation of the ground below the foundation will not admit of more weight being put upon the monument. The foundation was originally placed 8 feet below the surface, and has now settled 8½ inches. The settling began while the monument was in process of building, and as in settling the shaft leaned north, the builders still built according to the plumb-line, and the whole pile is crooked.

THE SOUTH.

GOV. CHAMBERLAIN, of South Carolina, telegraphs to President Hayes: "In view of the telegraphic reports, I consider it proper to state that the proposition for a new election here is wholly new to me. So far as I know, no one here has ever proposed or considered such a plan.".... The steamer Gov. Garland was recently burned on the Arkansas river. One cabin and three deck passengers and all the books and cargo lost.

THE Republican State Central Committee of New Orleans has expelled P. B. S. Pinchback from the organization.... Ex-Gov. Warmoth, of Louisiana, has submitted to the President a plan for settling the internal troubles of that unhappy State. He suggests that the members of the Legislature whose seats are not contested meet and pass upon the contested ones, irrespective of all Returning Board figures. Then, after the result shall have been made known, let the completed Legislature in joint convention canvass the returns for State officers. Whoever shall be counted in by this procedure let him be proclaimed the lawful occupant of the office for which he was a candidate.

ADAM JOHNSON, Nelson Brown, Lucius Thomas and John Henry Dennis, all colored, were recently executed for murder at Aiken, S. C. Steve Anderson was to have been hung at the same time, but was respited for thirty days.

A POINT of some importance in the legal contest for the Governorship of South Carolina has been gained by Hampton in a decision of the Charleston Circuit Court, releasing a prisoner held on the warrant of one of Chamberlain's magistrates. The court held that Hampton was lawfully elected Governor in November, and that Chamberlain has no legal claim to the office. The decision places the most important judicial district in the State, with all its official machinery, in the hands of the Hamptonites.

A NEW ORLEANS telegram says "the Brookses, of Boston, owners of several millions of property in New Orleans, have paid their taxes to the Nicholls Collectors. Many large property-owners have paid their taxes to the Nicholls Government, including Burnside, the largest property-owner in Louisiana."

POLITICAL.

A WASHINGTON dispatch says: "Senator Morton, after mature consideration, has reconsidered his first determination, and now decides not to accept the Chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but to retain the Chairmanship of the Elections Committee. This is the second time that Morton has declined the Chairmanship of the Foreign Affairs Committee, which has generally been considered the most distinguished position in the Senate. The previous time was when Sumner was removed.".... The entire Republican State ticket is elected in New Hampshire by an average majority of 3,000. The Congressional delegation stands two Republicans and one Democrat.

JUDGE M. W. GIBBS, of Arkansas, a prominent colored politician, in a conversation with the President, the other day, remarked that the nomination of Mr. Key as Postmaster General had excited some alarm among the colored people, but it was offset by the nomination of Mr. Douglass, and he assured the President that the colored people intended to support him in his measures of reconciliation. Judge Gibbs says the President remarked in reply that he was sincere in his policy, and would adhere to it unless it should prove impracticable. For eight years the policy of force and musket had been tried in the South, but had failed, and public sentiment now demanded a change.

IN a letter to Senator Merrimon, of North Carolina, Postmaster General Key says that, in making his appointments to offices within his gift in the Postoffice Department, he shall always give Republicans the preference, if suitable men are recommended whose selection will be satisfactory to the people most concerned, but otherwise he shall appoint Democrats.... Wade Hampton has given a guarantee to the President that if the United States troops are withdrawn from South Carolina he will proceed against Chamberlain by process of law, and that no violence whatever will take place.

THE Ohio Legislature, on the 20th of March, elected Hon. Stanley Matthews United States Senator. The Democratic members made no nomination, and generally voted blank.... Mr. Washburne expects to retain the French mission. He will return to Paris in April.... J. Don Cameron has been elected to the United States Senate from Pennsylvania, in place of his father, Simon Cameron, resigned.

IT is stated in a dispatch from Washington that "while, as a general principle, the President's plan of civil-service reform does not contemplate the removal of those whose commissions [illegible] this is only adopted as a general rule, affording solid ground to stand on at the start. But it can be accepted as beyond question as equally a part of the President's plan to see to it that if office has been obtained by improper means, or if improper persons are found in office, the mere fact of their holding commissions will afford them no protection. All cases of this kind brought to the attention of the President will be fully considered as rapidly as they can be reached.".... Gov. Robinson, of New York, nominated Gen. George B. McClellan for State Superintendent of Public Works, and the Senate rejected him by a vote of 13 to 9.

GENERAL.

COMMERCIAL failures: Garth W. James, bridge-builder, Milwaukee, liabilities, $75,000; Haskell & Brown, produce, Montreal, $175,000; J. H. Hoffmeier, groceries, Cornwall, Ont., $40,000; Oliver Bourke, liquors, Detroit; H. J. Tiffin, general dealer in staple articles, Montreal, $150,000; the First National Bank, Allentown, Pa.; Capt. Eber Ward, a large vessel owner, Detroit, liabilities heavy.... Fires: At Athens, Ohio; loss $30,000; Parkersburg, Iowa, $10,000; Boston, Mass., $30,000; Lebanon, Tenn., $30,000.... The American schooner Montana was recently detained by a customs officer at the Mexican port of Mazatlan, and the Secretary of the United States Navy now sends a ship-of-war to the offending quarter to ascertain the facts.

AN English steamer, with arms from New Haven for Constantinople, has been lost at sea. ....Hon. E. B. Washburne, the United States Minister at Paris, was called upon at Washington, the other day, by a committee of Germans and presented with resolutions thanking him for services to their countrymen during the Franco-German war.... Gen. Grant, it is said, will start in a few days on his two years' European tour. The ex-President left Washington for St. Louis last week.

FOREIGN.

THE French Government has finally obtained permission from the House of Deputies to prosecute Paul Cassagnac, the editorial bully and professional duelist. Cassagnac, himself a member, took part in the debate on the subject. —A LONDON dispatch says Russian negotiations with England have been virtually settled. Lord Derby's alterations of the protocol have been approved by Count Schouvaloff, the Russian Ambassador, and the Russian Government has assented to the revised protocol.... A formidable insurrection has broken out in Japan. It is headed by Saigo, a Marshal of the imperial army.... The Dominion House of Commons has voted down a proposition to afford more protection to Canadian products by means of tariff duties.

A CABLE dispatch announces a six hours' battle between Turks and Bosnians near Bonaventure, in which both sides suffered severely. ....Advices from India report a large decrease in the number of natives employed on the public works in Bombay and Madras—an indication that the pressure of famine is abating.... The speech of the Sultan at the opening of the Turkish Parliament is largely devoted to a weak apology for the present deplorable condition of the Ottoman empire, coupled with the customary promises to do better in the future.

SEVERAL highly distinguished European officers, who have long been investigating the strength of the Turkish army, state that the official estimates are vastly exaggerated. The Turks only have on the Danube frontier and in Bosnia and Herzegovina, 159,000 men, with, what seems hardly credible, 225 cannon. This force they are preparing to strengthen with a reserve of 25,000 men. They have, on the Asiatic frontier, about 75,000 men and 120 cannon. Altogether their army numbers 250,000.

THE state of the Pope's health is a matter of anxious solicitude to the European Governments, and foreign Ministers to the Vatican have been notified to report fully and frequently concerning the physical condition of Pius IX. The venerable pontiff will be 85 years old on the 13th of May next.... The news from Montenegro is of a warlike character. Prince Nicholas refuses to surrender the territory gained from him by conquest, and has appealed to the European powers to sustain him.... Serious labor riots are reported in Berlin ... The London News' Berlin correspondent, commenting upon the fact that the German Parliament, by the decisive majority of 71, had favored Leipsic as the seat of the imperial law court, says this is the severest blow yet dealt at Prussia, and the work of centralization and consolidation.

AN Amsterdam banker recently offered Russia a loan of 25,000,000 roubles at 8 per cent., but the negotiation fell through in consequence of the banker insisting on disarmament and an engagement to raise no other loan for five years as the conditions for the one he offered.... There were great festivities in Berlin on the 22d of March, in celebration of the 80th birthday of Emperor William.... Destitution and distress prevail among the working people in large districts of Germany, and portions of Silesia are threatened with actual famine. The plan of giving employment to the idle and hungry on public works to be undertaken for the purpose is proposed in some of the cities, and relief committees are forming in the capital.

CONGRESS.

Extra Session of the Senate.

FRIDAY, March 16.—The Senate received a message from the President, saying he had no further communication to make at this session. Accompanying the message were about 100 nominations, mostly for minor offices. Without transacting any business the Senate went into executive session, and soon after adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 17.—After a long discussion, by a vote of yeas 30, nays 8, the resolution was agreed to authorizing a sub-committee of three of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to visit Oregon during the recess, if they deem it expedient, and examine the charges against Senator Grover, of that State.... It was agreed to print 10,000 extra copies of the Monetary Commission report.... The Committees on Printing and to control the contingent expenses of the Senate were authorized to sit during the recess.... The thanks of the Senate were voted to Vice President Wheeler, who responded briefly, at the close of which he declared the Senate adjourned without day.... In executive session Frederick Douglass was confirmed as Marshal of the District of Columbia by a vote of 30 to 12.... Before the final adjournment, Mr. Morton formally declined the Chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and Mr. Hamlin was assigned to the position. Mr. Ferry was made Chairman of the Posta Committee.

Madness of Crowds.

Put 2,000 men together on an open prairie, and, if they are panic-stricken, they will trample one another to death. They will rush like a herd of frightened buffaloes, and you might as well think of reading the ten commandments to stop them as to control their flight.

THE Austrian army is gradually to exchange its well-known white uniform for blue. Half of the infantry will receive blue tunics this year, and the rest of the troops will receive them in 1878.

FASHIONS.

SPRING BONNETS.

The new bonnets are quite small of themselves, but are given ample size by their abundant trimmings. The capote, with soft drooping crown, and the Normandy, with high pointed crown, are most often seen. More distinguished-looking than these are the broad square crowns with close drooping fronts; pointed Mother Goose crowns have disappeared. Tuscan braids of deepest straw tints, lace straws, Milans, and Leghorns are the choicest novelties; fine French chips are also largely imported, and are liked because they are light, soft and pliable; but the love for the novel and scarce will make the yellow Italian braids most fashionable. Chip bonnets plain on the frame, or else gathered and shirred as capotes and Normandys, are also among the choice selections. White bonnets, trimmed with very light colors, are the rule for straws; the exceptions are black chips trimmed with the new light shades of yellow, green or red. Black lace bonnets of plain or of figured net laid plainly on the frame are among the most elegant of the importations.

NEW KID GLOVES.

Kid gloves for the spring retain their long-wristed shapes, and are entirely without fanciful stitching or ornament, being merely bound at the top with white kid, while the stitching on the back is simply that made necessary by overstitching the three seams, which is done in silk of the same shade as the kid. Gloves long enough to require three or four buttons at the wrist are most used for the street; evening and full-dress gloves are much longer, requiring from six to twelve buttons. Gray is the leading color for street-gloves, and is shown in great variety, beginning with pale French gray, going through blue-grays and steel-gray down to the dark iron-gray and ink shades. Fine drab and putty shades are chosen by ladies of taste, because they are of unobtrusive hues, and the various wood colors are popular for the same reason. Cream color is more used than ever, and deeper yellow shades are now imported, such as straw, maize, and even butter-cup color, to match the bonnet trimmings. Ink shades are sold all through the summer for morning wear and for traveling. Pinkish lavender and marine are offered again after being dropped for a time. Undressed kid gloves are almost superseding dressed kid for street wear. They are brought out in medium and in dark shades of gray and brown for general use, while for more dressy costumes are the stylish light-drab shades, buff and pale French gray. For evening white undressed kid gloves, and for deep mourning soft dull-black gloves of undressed kid are preferred to all others.

For the summer the novelty will be long white lace mitts that reach up to the elbow. These are very much worn in Paris at present, and ladies who have been abroad are introducing them here.

WHITE MUSLIN WRAPPERS.

The newest white muslin wrappers are made of nansook, trimmed with bands of Hamburg insertion and plain or frilled edging. They are in princesse shape, perfectly plain down the front and sides, quite narrow in the skirt, and are finished down the middle of the back by a princesse pleating set in below the Marguerite waist low on the tournure, and forming a fan train. The insertion is placed straight up each front, crosses over the shoulders, and is in each of the three seams that shape the back. In others it has the outline of a sacque that is longer in front than behind.

NEW PERCALE DRESSES.

Imported percale dresses for ladies are made with fitted basques and demi-trained skirts, on which the upper skirt is draped, so as to form two aprons in front and a square drapery behind. These are made of dark-blue striped percale, brown or green, and are edged with white Hamburg-work. They cost $14 or $15.

PARASOLS.

Parasols are coming into use again for the intermediate seasons, for street and for carriage wear, while the larger sun umbrellas are to be reserved for midsummer. These parasols are chosen, according to the Parisian fashion, to match the dress with which they are worn, and may be made to order of the dress material. They are richly trimmed with ruffles, pleats, frills, fringe, and also with embroidery. This embroidery is sometimes self-colored, and in other cases is of gay contrasting colors; it appears not only on the parasol, but on the ruffle which edges it. Others have ruffles raveled out on each edge to form fringe, and some have Tom Thumb fringe set on.—Harper's Bazar.

The Pay of Lecturers.

Mr. B. Redpath, of Boston, makes all Henry Ward Beecher's engagements, and it is stated that he has him down this season for eighty lectures, at $500 each, or $40,000 in all. Theodore Tilton lectured eight months last year and cleared about $9,000. His terms, when he makes special engagements, average $150 per night. Dr. E. H. Chapin commands from $125 to $150 in the lecture room, and delivers about forty lectures during the season. George W. Curtis is out of the field for the present. Wendell Phillips will not go more than a days' journey from his home. His price is $200, but he frequently takes less, even when that sum is agreed upon, if the audience is not large enough to pay. Gough takes better than any other man on the lecture list except Beecher, and can get from $200 to $250 each for all the lectures he is able to deliver. Frederick Douglass averages about forty nights in the season, and his price is $100. Prof. Doremus, the chemist, commands from $150 upward, according to the elaborateness of his illustrations. Du Chaillu is expected back from Europe in time for the season. He does not demand more than $115, and will not take less. Dr. Hempworth, Dr. Gallaher, and Dr. Hayes, the Arctic explorer, command each $100. The Rev. Robert Collyer, of Chicago, is a favorite, and easily gets $125. Frank Beard, the artist, gets $100. John G. Saxe is at present on the invalid list, but when able to lecture his price is likewise $100.

Ladies who succeed on the platform command almost as high figures as men. Grace Greenwood can get fifty engagements at $100 each. Mrs. Abby Sage Richardson asks the same amount. Mrs. Waller is good for $125 to $150 every night. Anna Dickinson tops them all. The price that successful lecturers now ask and get is exorbitant in comparison with the figures before the war. Up to 1860, the most popular lecturer in the country could not command more than $60, and very few could get that sum. Beecher often lectured for $40 or $50, and considered himself well paid.

Simon Cameron.

Senator Cameron is the oldest member of the Senate, having just completed his 78th year. His service in the body long antedates that of any other Senator, but has not been continuous. He was first elected in 1845 to serve out the unexpired term of James Buchanan, who resigned to go into President Polk's Cabinet as Secretary of State. It was not until sixteen years after that the Senators next longest in service—Messrs. Howe and Hamlin—entered the chamber. Mr. Cameron was a Democrat during his first term, but had decided tendencies against slavery. After four years in the Senate he returned to his business, not having been re-elected. He was one of the fathers of the Republican party, attending its first national convention and running as one of the Fremont electors in 1856. In 1857 he was again elected to the Senate, capturing three Democratic votes, and defeating John W. Forney, who was President Buchanan's candidate. At the Chicago Convention of 1860 he was one of the prominent candidates for the Presidency, and might perhaps have been nominated if it had not been for the active though secret hostility of Gov. Curtin. Mr. Cameron never forgave Gov. Curtin for what he called an act of treachery. He resigned the Senatorship in 1861 to go into President Lincoln's Cabinet as Secretary of War, from which position he soon resigned to take the Russian mission. He remained only a short time abroad, and on returning resumed the control of his party in Pennsylvania, and was a third time elected to the Senate, taking his seat in 1867. In 1872 he was re-elected. Old as he is, the retiring Senator is still vigorous, physically and intellectually, and it would not be surprising if he should again appear in public life. He has lost nothing of his wonderful skill in politics, and his control of the Republican party in Pennsylvania seems to be as absolute as ever.—New York Tribune.

Butter, Eggs and Cheese Product.

The following statistics of the export of butter from this country were read at the Butter and Egg Convention in Chicago: Packages of butter received in New York up to Dec. 31, 1876, 1,295,571, against 1,188,287 in 1875; boxes of cheese so received, 2,152,007, against 2,322,015 in 1875; barrels of eggs likewise received, 510,000, against 635,000 the previous year. Butter exported from New York, 10,791,700 pounds, against 4,335,800 in 1875; cheese, 93,025,806, against 91,992,200 in 1875; eggs, none. Exports from all ports, for the year ending June 30, 1876—butter, 4,644,894 pounds, valued at $1,109,496; cheese, 97,676,264 pounds, worth $12,270,083; eggs, 29,633 dozen, worth $8,300; total value, $13,387,879—reduction of $1,787,463 from 1874–75. Value of condensed milk exported in 1875-76, $118,549, against $123,565 in 1874–75. Total exports from all countries, except the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1876: Butter, pounds, 4,644,894—value, $1,109,496; cheese, 97,676,264—value, $12,270,683.

St. Louis Oratory.

A medal was presented to Mr. John McCullough, the tragedian, a few days ago, on the stage of a St. Louis theater, after his acting of King Lear. Col. Normile, a lawyer, was the spokesman, and his speech was a marvel. We make an extract: "A few lovers of the mighty priest that sleeps by the waters of the Avon are gathered here to commune with that awful shade you have evoked as by the weird power of the magician. Tossed in the tempest of impetuous grief, we have seen the dethroned and wandering spirit of Lear torn from its moorings and set adrift on the stormy ocean of emotional madness. It is the grandest, yet saddest, character ever told in human story. High above the Œdipus of the Greeks, it soars in poetic splendor until, proudly seated on Parnassian heights, it remains the highest prize of the histrionic profession."

Population of the Black Hills.

A correspondent of the Sidney Telegraph estimates the population of the different towns in the Black Hills as follows: Deadwood, 2,500; Gayville, 1,000; South Bend, 500; Washington City, 250; Lead City, 250; Golden Gate, 300; False Bottom, 200; Montana City, 200; Crook City, 400; Spearfish, 200; Custer City, 500; El Dorado, 100; Rapid City, 150; total, 6,550.

From trustworthy sources it is estimated than an emigration of at least 30,000 persons will take place the coming season, so that at the end of 1877 the Black Hills will have a population of from 20,000 to 3,0000 inhabitants. With this population it is expected that a large amount of capital will be brought in, and an increased and highly productive business insured—San Francisco Call.

A Returning Board.

Pettengill says that the first "returning board" of which he has any recollection was a shingle in the hands of his father. The three—father, son and shingle—used to hold frequent committee meetings in the back shed, but the returns came in so swiftly that a fair count was impracticable.

MRS. HAWKINSON, an Indianapolis negress, was a member of a Methodist church and of a society called the Ladies' Temple. She died, and both organizations claimed the right of conducting her funeral. The Temple party accompanied the remains to the church, and were there met by the pastor and his supporters. A fight for possession of the body soon followed. The pastor's side triumphed, and he preached the funeral sermon with exultant fervor.

RETURNS made to the Bureau of Statistics at Washington show that during the month of January, 1877, the total exports of beef from the port of New York amounted to 4,567,633 pounds, valued at $411,619. Of the total exports, 1,976,000 pounds, valued at $185,550, consisted of fresh beef (in refrigerators), which was shipped to Great Britain.

COMMERCIAL NOTES.

A FIRM in Newburgh, N. Y., is shipping lawn-mowers to England and Germany. The orders are large.

AUSTRALIA imported rabbits to keep down the weeds. She is now importing weasels to keep down the rabbits.

THE French say that their commerce sprang up from 5,800,000,000 francs to 7,700,000,000 in consequence of the Exposition of 1867.

A PITTSFIELD manufacturer is sending carriage rugs and baskets to South America, Norway and Sweden, and is enlarging his mill, as a result of the Exhibition.

NO PORT so small now as not to be able to trade with Brazil direct. Richmond, Va., has just dispatched two brigs to Brazil loaded with flour, petroleum, and clothing.

THE London Times says that "the supply of provisions from America can be poured unceasingly into this country without danger of exceeding the ever-growing demand."

GERMANY'S resolution is unshaken not to go into the Exposition of 1878. As the Director General will not recognize private exhibitors, and Germany refuses to appoint the Commissioner through whom the exhibitors must apply, the non-participation of the Germans seems a fixed fact.

THE smaller cotton ports did better this year than New Orleans. The total receipts since Sept. 1 were 3,407,924 bales, against 3,295,251 last year; but New Orleans received 961,169 bales, as compared with 1,059,892 last year. Norfolk, Mobile, and Galveston show a handsome increase. Charleston and Savannah exported less.

A VESSEL has just sailed from Philadelphia for Italian ports laden with samples of American goods of all descriptions. A special agent will distribute them throughout the kingdom with the view of obtaining orders in competition with European manufacturers. Philadelphia is manifesting a great deal of the commercial spirit which insures the prosperity of a seaboard community.

THE Department of Agriculture reports that the corn crop of this year will reach about 1,295,000,000 bushels. Illinois heads the list of States with 250,000,000 bushels. Next in rank are Iowa (155,000,000), Ohio, Indiana, Missouri and Kansas. The price of corn is highest in Massachusetts (95 cents) and lowest in Kansas (23 cents). The wheat crop of this year will reach nearly 250,000,000 bushels.

THE wonderful stories that were told early last year as to how cheaply a valuable quality of pig iron could be manufactured in the State of Ohio have been realized by the work of the season. The metal is produced at a cost of only $12 or $13 a ton. They have the iron, limestone, and coal sometimes on the same land, and always near together. Ordinarily the same grade of metal has cost from $17 to $23 to produce. Cheap iron is assured to the United States.

THE report of the Auditor of Cincinnati for the year ending Jan. 1, 1877, states the total bonded debt of that city at $21,901,327.45. Of this $15,604,000 are railroad debts, $14,542,000 of it for the Cincinnati Southern railway. The taxable valuation of the city Jan. 1, 1876, was $184,498,565. The income of the city for the year ending Jan. 1, 1876, was $785,000, and of this $311,000 was procured by the sale of city bonds. It is said that since the Auditor's report came out the issue of bonds for the Cincinnati Southern has been increased to $17,342,000.

A Curious Memento of the War.

A gentleman of this city, a day or two ago, while walking over the battle-ground of the Crater, picked up a curious and interesting relic of that famous and hotly-contested field. It was two Minie balls flattened and imbedded in each other. One of them was a Federal and the other a Confederate ball, and, on being fired from opposite directions, they had struck squarely against each other, and became imbedded one in the other, forming as it were a ring of lead, with the balls projecting on either side, and retaining sufficient traces to distinguish the side to which they belonged. —Petersburg Index.

AGRICULTURAL AND DOMESTIC.

Around the Farm.

A SEED.

A wonderful thing is a seed;
The one thing deathless forever—
Forever old and forever new,
Utterly faithful, utterly true—
Fickle and faithless never.
Plant lilies and lilies will bloom;
Plant roses and roses will grow;
Plant hate and hate to life will spring;
Plant love and love to you will bring
The fruit of the seed you sow.

Here is a seasonable hint: Always use China eggs for nest-eggs, and never put eggs under a hen until she has set one night on a China egg, and is found upon her nest the second night; then at evening put the eggs under her—eleven to a large hen, and nine to a small one.

The Eastern dairymen have been singularly unfortunate this season. The elements have seemed to combine against them, and the prices obtained by them have ruled, on an average, 2 cents lower than last year. On the other hand, the cost of production and the management of a dairy have been as great as last year. The factory reports show a corresponding decrease per cow.

The wool-growers of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, West Virginia and Pennsylvania, at a meeting at Circleville, decided to erect a capacious storehouse at Steubenville, Ohio, for the purpose of storing their product and assorting it before placing it upon the market. This is a Patrons' movement, and the stock will be disposed of directly to manufacturers.

A writer in the Country Gentleman advocates rye bran for calves. He says: "I have never known a calf to die with black-leg that was fed rye bran and salt, together with hay, during the first winter. Rye or rye bran is loosening, and that with a few small potatoes will do wonders for your calves."

Wood Ashes as a Fertilizer.—To comprehend the part that ashes play as fertilizers it is necessary to understand of what they are composed. The composition of the different woods is as follows:

	Oak.	Elm.	Beech.	Pine.
Potash	8.43	21.93	15.83	....
Soda	6.63	13.72	2.88	0.07
Lime	75.45	47.80	63.33	46.15
Magnesia	4.49	7.71	11.29	18.46
Oxide of Iron	.57	.39	.79	3.26
Phosphoric acid	3.46	3.02	3.07	4.49
Sulphuric acid	1.16	1.29	1.35	3.03
Chlorine	.05	....	.14	.71
Silica	.73	3.07	1.32	8.38

It will be seen by a glance at the above that wood ashes contain all the inorganic constituents of plant food, and it is no wonder that they are appreciated when their merits are known. Besides furnishing direct food for plants, ashes operate indirectly by aiding in the decomposition of the vegetable and inorganic matter found in the soil, and setting their latent powers free. Sprinkle the orchard, therefore, liberally with ashes, if you wish for good fruit and plenty of it.

Hop Statistics.—The increased consumption of malt liquors of late years has so stimulated the demand for hops that the cultivation has become highly remunerative. The acreage of the world is now estimated at 250,000 acres. Of this amount the United States produces 25,000 acres, or 10 per cent. of the world's crops. Germany cultivates about 40 per cent., England 30 per cent., Austria 7 per cent., Belgium 6 per cent., France 4 per cent., the balance being produced in small quantities in various countries on the globe. German hops are superior to any other grown, and Bavarian hops bear the highest reputation of any in Germany. A good continental crop is estimated at 85,000,000 pounds, and the annual consumption at 60,000,000 pounds. The crop of 1876 is rated at 35,000,000; hence the foreign demand for American hops to assist in making up the deficiency. According to the last census report, the hop production of 1870 was nearly 17,500,000 pounds. The principal hop-producing States of the West are Wisconsin, Michigan, California, Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois and Ohio. It is not probable that the production is greater now than then, since the ravages of the hop aphis some years since acted severely on this industry. Under the stimulus of high prices, however, considerable activity is again manifested in this direction, and when the soil is suitable, and capital enough can be commanded to properly care for the product, it will be remunerative. Nevertheless it is an uncertain crop at best, and requiring exact knowledge in cultivation and unremitting care.

About the House.

A New York lecturer on health ridicules the Grahamite system. He recommends less starch and more mastication, less tea and more milk. He said bran bread had killed nearly all of his family, and rendered twenty-five years of his own life miserable before he discarded it.

Quick Wedding Cake.—Two and one-half cupfuls flour, one and one-half cupfuls sugar, one cupful butter, three-quarters cupful milk, two eggs, two tablespoonfuls rum, one-half nutmeg, one-half pound raisins, one-quarter pound currants, one-quarter teaspoonful soda.

A small quantity of carbolic acid is recommended to be used in whitewash and in paste for laying paper-hangings. It will repel cockroaches and other insects, and also neutralize the disagreeable odor consequent upon the decomposition of the paste.

Old newspapers will put the finishing touch to newly-cleansed silver knives and forks, and tinware, better than anything. Rub them well, and make perfectly dry. They are also excellent to polish stoves that have not been blackened for some length of time.

A small piece of paper or linen, moistened with spirits of turpentine and put into a bureau or wardrobe for a single day, two or three times, is said to be a sufficient preservative against moths.

Parents should be very careful and not let the rays of the sun shine directly upon the faces of sleeping children. Strong light is very injurious to the eyes, especially if they are inclined to weakness.

Two teaspoonfuls of finely-powdered charcoal, drank in half a tumbler of water, will often give relief to the sick headache when caused, as in most cases it is, by a superabundance of acid in the stomach.

Waterproof Boots.—The best material we have ever tried to make boots or harness pliable and waterproof is linseed oil, applied hot; and, if the leather be entirely free from water, the oil may be boiling hot without the least injury to the leather. One oiling of a pair of boots with linseed oil will do more service than three or four with tallow or neat's-foot oil.

To Take Off Starch or Rust from Flat-Irons.—Tie a piece of yellow beeswax in a rag, and, when the iron is nearly hot enough to use, rub it quickly with the wax, and then with a coarse cloth. If irons become rough, rub them with fine salt and they will be smooth.

To Remove Smoke and Dust from Wall Paper.—Tie a large piece of clean white cloth over a broom and brush the wall down well. Then take a stale loaf of bread, cut it open, and rub the soft side all over the paper. It will clean it "as nice as new." It will also remove spots of lime or whitewash.

A Nice Relish for Breakfast.—Take half a pound of fresh cheese, cut in thin slices and put in a frying-pan; turn over this two cups of sweet milk. Add a pinch of dry mustard, also of salt and pepper, and one spoonful of butter. Stir this mixture constantly. Roll six Boston crackers very fine, and stir in very gradually, then turn at once into a hot dish and serve immediately.

Hugged by a Grizzly.

Last week, a man named Walpole, who resides in Lassen county, had a fearful combat with a grizzly. It appears that Mr. Walpole started out early in the morning of the day on which the adventure occurred, for the purpose of visiting a deer-lick. He had his rifle, bowie-knife, and a large deer-hound with him, and was crossing a deep canyon, when he espied a huge grizzly about fifty or seventy-five yards off. The opportunity was too good a one to let pass, so he pulled up and blazed away; but his aim was not very accurate, and he only succeeded in wounding the animal, and before he had time to reload his rifle the bear was close upon him, and there was no alternative but to stand his ground and trust in Providence and in his weapons. The bear came right after him, and Walpole, who was on the alert, succeeded in hitting him one on the head with the butt of his rifle, but ere he could repeat the blow his bearship returned the compliment and dealt him one on the shoulder that paralyzed him for a second. Being now fully alive to his situation, he drew his bowie-knife and made a lunge at bruin and succeeded in planting his knife deep in the beast's breast. This only enraged the animal still more, and, seizing his destroyer in his powerful arms, he gave him an embrace that he will not be apt to forget for some time, and which rendered him totally unconscious. He lay where the bear had dropped him until late in the afternoon, when a neighbor who was passing was attracted to the spot, and his astonishment may be imagined when, upon going a short distance from the wounded man, he found the bear dead as a door-nail. The animal measured eleven feet in length and weighed in the neighborhood of 1,400 pounds. Mr. Walpole, although badly bruised, is not seriously injured, and he says he is "a wiser if not a better man."—Downieville (Cal.) Messenger.

A Boy's Composition.

Girls are the most unaccountable things in the world—except women. Like the wicked flea, when you have them they ain't there. I can cipher clean over to improper fractions, and the teacher says I can do it first-rate, but I can't cipher out a girl, proper or improper, and you can't either. The only rule in arithmetic that hits their case is the double rule of two. They are as full of old Nick as their skin can hold, and they would die if they couldn't torment somebody. When they try to be mean they are as mean as parsley, though they ain't as mean as they let on, except sometimes, and then they are a good deal meaner. The only way to get along with a girl when she gets at you with her nonsense is to give her tit for tat, and that will flummux her; and when you get a girl flummuxed she is as nice as a new pin. A girl can sow more wild oats in a day than a boy can sow in a year, but girls get their wild oats sowed after a while, which boys never do, and then they settle down as calm and placid as a mud puddle. But I like girls first-rate, and I guess the boys all do. I don't care how many tricks they play on me, and they don't care either. The hoity-toitiest girls in the world can't always boil over like a glass of soda. By-and-by they will get into the traces with somebody they like, and pull as steady as an old stage horse. That is the beauty of them. So let them wave, I say; they will pay for it some day, sewing on buttons and trying to make a decent man of the feller they have spliced on to, and ten chances to one if they don't get the worst of it.

A Queer Phase of Gold and Silver Work.

On the closing up of the Smith & Rogers silver-plating concern in New Haven, a few days ago, preparatory to its removal to Meriden, the floor of the plating-room was taken up, burned, and the ashes analyzed, with the result of procuring pure silver to the amount of $981. This result is not so strange as appears at first sight. The precious metals are capable of extreme volatilization under heat, becoming mere vapors, which may be condensed, resulting in the production of the metal in a pure form. But, even without heat, the particles of gold and silver are made so exceedingly fine, in the processes of the manufacture of gold and silver goods, whether solid or plated, that no devices for saving the material abraded or thrown off in the various manipulations are entirely effectual. Even in the Government assay offices the soot deposited in the chimneys from the melting of the crude metal is valuable; and in most manufactories of articles of gold and silver the proprietors do not allow the workmen to retain their work-clothes when worn out, but pay for them a price generally sufficient to procure new garments—an old tattered vest belonging to a bench workman sometimes being valued by his employers, even when worn to rags, at $20.—Hartford (Conn.) Times.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

The Policy of the Administration Outlined.

The civil-service programme of the new administration, says a Washington correspondent, involves the temporary revival, so far as it is possible to enforce them, of the rules and the machinery of examination which were established by President Grant's civil-service commission, authorized by the act of March 3, 1871, and terminated in the summer of 1874. It is the aim of Secretary Schurz ultimately to introduce rules and examinations similar to those in the English civil service, but for the present the system introduced by Geo. Wm. Curtis, Joseph Medill, and Dorman B. Eaton will be made use of. They divided the civil service into four divisions, as follows: First, officers elected; second, employes below the grade of regular clerks; third, those higher officers who represent the policy of the dominant party, such as sustain relations of personal confidence, judicial officers, etc.; fourth, the residue of the civil service, being the great body of subordinate officers and clerks by which the Federal administration is carried on, in number perhaps 25,000, not including Postmasters. The rules of examination adopted by the old Commissioners applied only to the latter class. This class was divided into four grades, and appointments were only made to the lowest grade and vacancies in the several higher grades were filled by promotions from the next lower grade. In addition to a certain degree of knowledge of penmanship, grammar, arithmetic, book-keeping, history, geography, and the Government of the United States, the rules required written proof that the applicant was a citizen of the United States, had a good moral character and temperate habits, was of suitable age and health, occupation past and present, place of residence, etc. Three persons appointed to represent each department were to have charge of examinations in that department. The appointments were to be made from among those who stood highest on the examination lists. The several States and Territories were grouped into five districts, and examinations were directed to be held in the cities of Boston, New York, Washington, Savannah, Memphis, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Detroit. Political assessments in the departments were prohibited. Congress at its next session will be asked to make an appropriation to enable the system above described to be put fully in operation. Until this is done it will be possible only to hold examinations in Washington, and perhaps New York, but the rules in regard to examinations and promotions can be fully enforced here without an appropriation.

The New Petroleum Fever.

The excitement of the early days of the petroleum discovery in Philadelphia is exceeded now through the recent finding of oil about Bradford, in spite of the stubbornly held opinion of geologists and experts that oil did not exist so far north. The first believer that oil could be found in the valley was Job Moses, who had made a fortune in patent medicines at Rochester, N. Y. He bought large tracts of land about Limestone fourteen years ago, and bored diligently, but he found only indications. He spent all his money in his venture and when it was gone tried to induce speculators to invest, and was so enthusiastic that people called him crazy. The oil was found two years ago, and since then not less than $10,000,000 has been invested within a circuit of twenty miles. Land that two years ago would have been dear at any price now sells at $1,000 an acre. Within a distance of four miles three flourishing towns have sprung into existence, and the town of Bradford, formerly consisting of a lumberman's tavern and a few scattered farm-houses, now has 3,500 inhabitants, and the furore has extended north into New York State. The oil belt is about two miles wide, and has now nearly 400 producing wells. One peculiarity is that the oil is found at a great depth, the average being 1,100 feet, and some wells are 1,400 feet deep, and the daily product is about 2,000 barrels. There are three pipe lines connecting the wells with the Erie road, thirteen miles away, and one is to be built sixty miles long. A branch of the Erie road that runs through the district and whose business, a few months ago, was but $3,500 a month, now does $85,000 a month. Much of the land is bought outright, but in most cases it is leased and the owner paid a bonus and royalty, one-fourth being now claimed. Capital is now pouring into the valley, and owners are all dreaming of wealth, the very dooryards being invaded by the derrick and drill. "Crazy" Job Moses is making $500 a day on royalties, but the most noticeable case of sudden wealth is Mike McCarthy, a drunken Irish switch-tender of the Erie railroad. His father left him sixty acres of land that Mike couldn't pay the taxes on and would have sold at any price. But he had a shrewd wife who wouldn't let it go, and Mike is now selling at $1,000 an acre and is making $500 a week on royalties. Mike still wears his greasy switchman's clothes, but he is having "a high old time," throwing his money around loose among the boys, and is the modified Johnny Steele of this new dispensation.

A Remarkable Story.

Mr. William Whitehead, who resided near Claysville, Ky., died in June, 1870. Early in that year he made a will, and bequeathed the sum of $2,800 for the purpose of moving the bodies of the deceased members of his family, and to improve the grounds, to a burying-ground near the mouth of Beaver creek. The executor, Mr. N. R. Whitehead, proceeded to discharge his duties by employing Mr. John B. Hamilton to remove them, improve the grounds, and erect head and foot stones at their graves.

Among those to be removed was a child of Dr. Will Curran, of Claysville. Mr. H. disinterred the child, which was buried in a metallic case on the 6th day of July, 1855, in the Whitehead burying-ground in Claysville, and being unable to remove the screws in the face-plate of the case was compelled to saw it off. Upon removing the face-plate a sight was revealed that struck them dumb with astonishment. Instead of finding, as they expected, a few bones as the remains of their household pet, they beheld, as it were, a sleeping infant. The child looked as natural as life, and was in a perfect state of preservation, with the exception of the nose, which was gone. The doctor, being present, immediately carried it to his home.

This was, indeed, a great curiosity, and many of the citizens of Claysville and vicinity came to the doctor's office to see the body. But the strangest part is not told. The child, which was 2 years old when it died, was very fond of flowers, and more especially of the damask rose, and when taken by its grandmother, with whom it was a great pet, it would go to this rose bush. When the child was dying its grandmother pulled two damask rosebuds, not yet bursted, gave them to the child, and it died with them in its hand. After preparing the body for burial the rosebuds were placed upon its breast and buried with it. When the face-plate was removed from the case the roses were not only in a perfect state, but the leaves were as green as ever, and, instead of being buds, as they were when placed upon the child's breast, had become full-blown roses.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Webster on Farming.

Washington, March 13, 1822.

John Taylor: I am glad to hear from you again, and to learn that you are all well, and that your teams and tools are ready for spring's work, whenever the weather will allow you to begin. I sometimes read books on farming, and I remember that a sensible old author advises farmers "to plow naked and to sow naked." By this he means that there is no use in beginning spring's work till the weather is warm, that a farmer may throw aside his winter's clothes and roll up his sleeves. Yet he says we ought to begin as early in the year as possible. He wrote some very pretty verses on the subject, which, as far as I remember, ran thus:

While yet the spring is young, while earth unbinds
The frozen bosom to the western winds;
While mountain snows dissolve against the sun,
And streams, yet new, from precipices run—
E'en in this early dawning of the year,
Produce the plow and yoke the sturdy steer,
And goad him till he smoke beneath his toil,
And the bright share is buried in the soil.

John Taylor, when you read these lines, do you not see the snow melting and the little streams beginning to run down the southern slopes of your Punch-brook pasture, and the new grass starting and growing in the trickling water, all green, bright and beautiful? And do you not see your Durham oxen smoking from heat and perspiration as they draw along your great break-up plow, cutting and turning over the tough sward in your meadow in the great field? The name of this sensible author is Virgil, and he gives farmers much other advice, some of which you have been following all this winter without even knowing that he had given it:

But when cold weather, heavy snows and rain
The laboring farmer in his house restrain,
Let him forecast his work with timely care,
Which else is huddled when the skies are fair;
Then let him mark the sheep, and whet the shining share,
Or hollow trees for boats, or number o'er
His sacks, or measure his increasing store;
Or sharpen stakes, and mend each rake and fork,
So to be ready, in good time, to work;
Visit his crowded barns at early morn;
Look to his granary, and shell his corn;
Give a good breakfast to his numerous kine,
His shivering poultry and his fat'ning swine.

And Mr. Virgil says some other things which you understand up at Franklin as well as ever he did:

In chilling winter swains enjoy their store,
Forget their hardships, and recruit for more;
The farmer to full feasts invites his friends,
And what he got with pains, with pleasure spends;
Draws chairs around the fire, and tells once more
Stories which often have been told before;
Spreads a clean table with things good to eat,
And adds some moistening to his fruit and meat.
They praise his hospitality, and feel
They shall sleep better after such a meal.

John Taylor, by the time you have got through this you will have read enough. The sum of all is, be ready for your spring's work as soon as the weather becomes warm enough, and then put your hand to the plow and look not back.

Daniel Webster.

Plunging Over Niagara.

About noon last Monday a man passed through the upper gate of Prospect Park, Niagara falls, and walked along the bank to a point just below the "tail-race" that empties into the river. One of the guides, who followed him to tell him where he could get the best views, was astonished to see him wading out into the rapids. "Come back, you fool; you will go over the falls!" The stranger paid no heed to the warning, but throwing himself forward on his face struck out for the brink of the cataract. Just below where he entered there was a small cascade, over which he was carried. When he emerged his hat was off, and a moment later he obtained a foothold in the rapids, and stood waist-deep in the foaming water. The guide was by this time at Prospect point, whither he had hastened, in the hope of being able to reach the man. The stranger, standing in the rapids, instantly struck out again, swimming lustily out further from the shore, and successfully placing himself beyond the aid of the man on the bank. He clasped his hands over his head and went down to his death. This suicide is as extraordinary as that of the Canadian chemist, near Detroit, who two days before had ended his life in order to test the efficacy of a resurrection powder.—New York Tribune.

Eight Children Poisoned.

Among the mining population of a little village called Stockton are three families named Bevans, Davis and Jones. On Monday Mrs. Bevans went away to obtain work or assistance of some kind for her family, who were suffering with hunger. She left her three children, aged 2, 4 and 6 years, respectively, alone. While she was gone the children went out, as one of them has since explained, to find something to eat. They went out to a swamp some distance from the house, where they dug up a white root—probably wild parsnip—that they discovered there and ate of it. They were joined by three of Mr. Davis' children, and two of Mr. Jones' in the meantime, and they all partook of the root. In a short time they were seized with violent convulsions, and were found by a boy named Johns, who came along and heard fearful cries coming from the swamp. Millie Bevans, aged 2; Gussie Jones, aged 6; and Mary Davis, aged 2, were dead. The others were rolling in agony on the ground. The boy procured aid, and the children were conveyed to their homes. A doctor was summoned and the sick children were treated with antidotes. Hopes are entertained of their recovery.—Mauch Chunk (Pa.) Cor. New York World.

Promotion in the English civil service is so blocked by the number of aged members in it that it is proposed to resort to compulsory retirement.

Opium Smoking.

The San Francisco Daily Bulletin thus describes one of the opium dens in that city, and the method of smoking the drug:

"A first-class opium den is fitted with a table about eight feet long and five feet wide, and two and a half feet high. This is covered with matting, and fine mats are placed on this. In the center of the table is a tray containing opium, opium pipes and a peculiarly shaped lamp, which has a small flame. The opium pipe is made of a piece of mahogany or ebony wood. The stem is about three-quarters of an inch in diameter, and about two feet in length. A hole about half an inch in diameter runs the whole length of the stem. About six inches from the end is the bowl of the pipe. It is made of a peculiar kind of sand and clay in China, and is very hard and fire-proof. The bowl is about two inches in diameter. The top of the bowl is entirely closed, except a small hole in the center, about the size of a large darning needle. In the bottom is a hole about half an inch in diameter, into which is inserted a brass coupling, connecting with the stem of the pipe. Opium is kept in a small box, made of horn. Every Chinaman carries one. When a person desires to smoke opium, he reclines upon the table upon one side. With a piece of steel about as long and the size of a large knitting needle, and sharpened, a little of the opium is taken from the box. It is held over the blaze of the lamp until it is cooked. The piece of steel is kept in motion all the time, and the opium, when cooked, is formed into the shape of a small pistol cartridge. The point of the steel needle is then inserted into the small hole in the center of the bowl of the pipe and gently drawn through the cartridge of opium. The smoker then turns the bowl of the pipe to the flame of the lamp, reposes upon a wooden pillow and smokes. He gently draws in his breath in long and rapid respirations. He must be careful, however, to slightly remove his lips from the stem of the pipe when taking breath. If he should breathe slightly into the stem it would stop the flow of the smoke of the opium. When the flow is stopped the sharp-pointed steel is used to open the small hole in the bowl of the pipe. It takes about three minutes to prepare the opium for the pipe, and about one to smoke it out, ten or twelve whiffs only being required. From six to twelve pipefuls are generally smoked before the smoker is satisfied. A little over a year ago a great many white people of both sexes patronized the opium dens. The Board of Supervisors deemed it best to put a check upon the growing evil, and a stringent law was passed, making it a penalty of not less than $10 nor more than $50, for the keeper of any opium den to allow a white person to smoke in the place. It was also made a criminal act for any white person to be found in an opium den, the fine being fixed at not less than $50. Since the passage of the law the dens drive a less lucrative business. Their customers are all Chinese, two generally occupying one table and using one lamp. The Chinese resort to opium-smoking for any slight ailment, and it is regarded by many of them as a panacea for all their ills."

The National Capitol.

The corner-stone of the Capitol was laid by Washington, on the 18th day of September, 1793. The building was opened for the meeting of Congress November 17, 1800. Enlargement and new dome completed in 1867. The edifice fronts the east, is 751 feet long, 348 feet wide, and covers 3½ acres; court yards 3½ acres; in all 7 acres. The predominant material of the exterior is white marble. The dome is of cast iron, 135½ feet in largest diameter, and 287½ feet high, surmounted by a statue of Liberty 19½ feet high. The interior of the dome forms a remarkable circular chamber, or rotunda, 96 feet in diameter, 180 feet high. One thousand gas-jets, flashed by electricity, illuminate the interior by night. The walls of the rotunda are adorned with historical paintings by eminent artists. The Senate chamber, House of Representatives, Supreme Court rooms, and other apartments, are splendidly decorated. The halls are lined with polished marbles from every State in the Union. Frescoes, paintings and sculptures abound. The front porticoes are supported by 100 Corinthian columns of white marble. The cost of the building was $13,000,000.

Col. Mulberry Sellers' Weakness.

Matching coin is the favorite diversion of John T. Raymond, according to the Dramatic News, which says that he will go out with a couple of hundred dollars in his pocket in the morning and return in the afternoon for more. Last fall, when in San Francisco, Raymond met Maurice Grau on the street, and they went together into the bar-room of the Palace Hotel. Raymond proposed matching. They matched two $10-pieces. Grau won. They doubled it. Grau won. From tens and twenties they went up to hundreds, a streak of luck accompanying Grau throughout. From hundreds they soon got to thousands. In less than half an hour Raymond had lost $32,000. So the story runs, at least. It was on honor, of course, as neither had that amount of money. Raymond was excited and nervous, and proposed matching the whole $32,000 on one cast. Grau consented, and put down head. Raymond matched him and won.

Cardinal Ledochowski has been sentenced by the District Court in Inowraslaw to two and a half years' imprisonment and a fine of 300 marks for having violated the Prussian ecclesiastical laws, and offered resistance to the authority of the state. The Cardinal is also found guilty of high treason.

The exorbitant rates at Harvard College excite considerable complaint. The best rooms cost $150 more than those equally good at Yale, while the best rooms at Williams command only $30. The cheap apartments are few, compared to the high-priced ones, so that only the wealthy class of students are able to room in the college at all.

Anderson M. Waddell, a sporting man well known at Cincinnati and Louisville, who killed Al. Kirkland and was recently acquitted, has deposited $5,000 to be invested for the benefit of Kirkland's widow and children. This is his own opinion of his guilt, regardless of the court's decision.

It is announced that Mlle. Albani, the opera singer, is to marry early next summer Mr. Gye, son of the London impresario. The lady has long been engaged to him, and their marriage has been repeatedly reported as having taken place privately.

Financial distress rapidly increases among the working classes of Germany, and the Government is loudly called upon for employment. New railroads and canal, are suggested, but, as these require long preparatory surveys, work cannot be immediately commenced upon them. All that can be employed will be placed upon the repair of roads.

James L. Winfrey, on returning to his home, in De Witt, Mo., after an absence of several years, found that his wife had replaced him with Mayo Hall. Winfrey did not care to recover his wife, but he did want his furniture, and went with a wagon to remove it. Hall argued that if he retained the woman he must also have the furniture, and he threatened to shoot whoever attempted to take it away. Thereupon Winfrey killed him, and was "exonerated" by a Justice of the Peace.

The line "Consistency's a jewel," originally appeared in Murtagh's collection of English and Scotch ballads. In the ballad of "Jolly Robyn Roughhead" are the following lines:

Tush! tush! my lassie! such thought resigne;
Comparisons are cruell.
Fine pictures suit in frames as fine,
Consistencye's a jewel.
For thee and me coarse clothes are best;
Rude folks in homelye raiment drest,
Wife Joan and Goodman Robyn.

THE WESTERN WINDS.

Yet on my cheek I feel the western wind,
And hear it telling to the orchard trees,
And to the faint and flower-forsaken bees,
Tales of fair meadows, green with constant streams,
And mountains rising blue and cool behind,
Where in moist dells the purple orchis gleams,
And starred with white the virgin's bower is twined.
So the o'er wearied pilgrim, as he fares
Along life's summer waste, at times is fanned,
Even at noontide, by the cool, sweet airs
Of a serener and a holier land,
Fresh as the morn, and as the dewfall bland,
Breath of the blessed heaven for which we pray;
Blow from the eternal hills!—make glad
Our earthly way!
—John G. Whittier.

The Earth's Age.

The age of the earth is estimated from the increment in the temperature as we penetrate its crust. The rate at which the earth cools can only be determined by making use of data confessedly imperfect, and from these Sir William Thomson finds that 100,000,000 or 200,000,000 years ago it first began to be crusted over by a solid film of rocks; that 10,000 years after its first crusting over the temperature of the crust increased two degrees Fahrenheit for every foot vertically descended below the zone of constant temperature. The present rate of increase is calculated at 1.51 of a degree.

A Poetical Preface.

Tennyson is a contributor to the new English review, the Nineteenth Century, and has written for the first number the following introduction:

Those that of late had fleeted far and fast
To touch all shores, now leaving to the skill
Of others their old craft, seaworthy still,
Have charter'd this; where, mindful of the past,
Our true co-mates regather round the mast,
Of diverse tongue, but with a common will,
Here, in this roaring moon of daffodil
And crocus, to put forth and brave the blast;
For some, descending from the sacred peak
Of hoar, high-templed Faith, have leagued again
Their lot with ours to rove the world about;
And some are wilder comrades, sworn to seek
If any golden harbor be for men
In seas of Death and sunless gulfs of Doubt.

AS THE GREAT PREVENTIVE

In all cases of blood poisoning whether arising from malarial or miasmatic exhalations, defective sewerage, or any other causes.

Its constant use prevents the contracting of contagious diseases, typhoid, scarlet and all malarial fevers. It is invaluable and should be used in all districts where fever and ague prevails as it is the greatest known preventive to that disease. It is of immense value in the cure of all skin disease; a trial proves it, and its use prevents contracting them. It is a special boon to school children who are constantly exposed. It is the most healthful bath soap for infants, worth its weight in gold in the nursery. Figures are what is wanted

Not election majorities, but such as interest the great army of American producers, Twenty-five years ago the eight counties of Missouri, now traversed by the Old Reliable Hanibal & St. Joseph Railroad were nearly a wilderness. To-day, by a late census, it is discovered that these counties produce over one-fourteenth of the entire wheat crop of the entire State, over one-twelfth of the corn crop, and over one-ninth of the oats. The same growth of country is now being repeated in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and New Mexico, and the immortal Greeley had this identical route and section of country in mind when he breath those stirring words of wisdom, "Young man, go West." Therefore, it is but naturla that parties taking this advice should desire to pass over a road that has done so much for a great State, (especially as it offers the best facilities) and see for themselves. By the Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad, through cars are run from Cleveland and Toledo, and thro' connections made from Cincinnati and Indianapolis, via Quincy, to St, Jo., Atchison and Kansas City, and from Chicago to Kansas City without change. We are about to issue, in connection with our own, a county map of Colorado and New Mexico, giving valuable information as regards time tables, routes, distances, altitudes, &c., which we will be pleased to furnish free, upon application in person or by letter addressed to

MESMERISM.

"Say, Peewit, old boy, did you ever try to mesmerize any one?" asked his friend Boggs, as they walked down to the ferry one of those crisp cold mornings last week.

"Do what?" inquired our bald-headed little friend, winking his starboard eye at a pretty girl in a shop window.

"Mes-mer-ize any person?" I said.

"Me?" asked Peewit.

"Yes you."

"Nary a mes, s'elp me Andy Jackson. Why?" inquired Peewit.

"Oh, nothing; only it's my private opinion you possess the gift" replied Boggs, impressively.

"Can't possess it very bad, for I've been vaccinated twice," said Peewit, jocosely.

"Jesting aside, Tom, I truly and firmly belive you'r a natural-born mesmerist," said Boggs, convincingly.

"Well, 'f I am, I never guessed it, an' one thing's dead certain, I never to my knowledge mesmerized anything in the heavens above, the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth," remarked Peewit, thoughtfully.

"Don't be so facetious about what you don't understand," said Boggs, irritably; "I s'pose it's the old story of the foolish man hiding his light under a bushel."

"Mine's been so long hid I'm 'fraid it's burnt out."

"Burnt out nothing. You've got a great power lying dormant within you, and I've often wondered that you didn't exercise it," said Boggs.

"Mebbe so; but I'd as soon thought I possessed a forty-acre farm in Turkey," replied Peewit, secretly resolving to study this mesmerism business up at once.

"I just wish you'd give it your attention."

"How's a fellow going to go about learning these clairvoyant ropes?" asked Peewit waving away a drove of bootblacks, who insisted upon polishing him up.

"Nothing easier in the world," replied Boggs. "Buy some of the works on mesmerism, study them up, and then quietly try your power on some one."

They parted at ferry, and that afternoon Peewit purchased an armful of books bearing on the subject, and put himself under a course of cramming for the balance of the week.

Last Monday evening he was riding home in one of the bob-tailed cars, a tall, lean, sharpe-chinned, bead-eyed woman on the seat opposite being the only other passenger.

"Here's a chance to test my new-born power," thought Peewit, and he hastened to avail of the opportunity. Fastening his eyes upon the woman's face, he laid aside the ham he was carrying home, and made a few passes in the air with his hands.

"Stop that," said the woman, so sharply that Peewit spoiled the charm by dropping his hands and eyes.

Two or three minutes later he tried it again, moving his arms around eccentrically.

"What're you tryin' to get through yourself anyhow?" asked the sharp-chinned female, watching him suspiciously.

"Aha, my lady, so you feel the mesmeric influence working," thought Peewit, and he pawed the air some more.

"F' you don't stop that foolishnese, Mr. Man, I'll make you holler like a loot," she threatened.

"She is evidently more and more under its influence thought Peewit, and he leand toward her and made a few motions with his fingers before her face.

She wasn't, however, sufficiently under its influence to prevent her getting up, kicking Peewit under the chin twice, and raking his bald head with her untrimmed finger nails.

"Hold on there, woman! Hang it, stop!" he shouted covering his face with his hands to prevent it being scratched.

"You will square off at me, will you?" she screa med, an she plucked his collar and neck-tie off and threw them out of the car window.

"I wasn't squaring off—I was only trying to mesmerize you. Darn it! lemme 'lone!" he exclaimed, trying to keep her off with his feet.

"I'll mesmerize you, you bald-headed old villain!" she shrieked, as she tore a handful of his shirt bosom out and tramped it in the straw at the bottom of the car.

"I'll have you 'restell, you hag! Ouch! Lordy!" he yelled, as she got him by the ear and tried to pull it off.

"You will tackle a poor, weak, tender, lone woman, you skunk?"

She was trying to get hold of his windpipe with her bony fingers, when the driver stopped the car and separated them, and Peewit bolted out of the door, leaving her one silk hat, one twelve-pound ham, and a handful of shirt bosom as the spoils of her victory.

"P-h-e-w! Great suffering catacombs! What and old female catamount! I don't believe anything short of a streak of forked lightning would mesmerize her," muttered Peewit, as he stopped under the first lamp-post to pin up some gaps she had made in his shirt raiment.

He did not test his mesmeric power again until last Sunday evening, when he chanced to find himself alone in the parlor with his spinster aunt, and concluded to practice on that sharp-tongued relative.

"Merciful heavens! What's got into the bald-headed old lunatic now?" asked his spinster aunt as she saw him making figures in the air with his hands.

Peewit sawed away at airy nothing, and made no reply.

"He's got the delirious tremens, the little ginpig!" she exclaimed, watching him over the top of her specs.

Peewit hitched his chair toward her, waving his hands around and trying to hold her spell-bound with his eye.

"Won't I tickle his feet when they put him in a straight jacket and clap ice on his head!" chuckled his spinster relative.

Peewit got very red in the face; but he bit his lips to keep him from saying naughty words, and hitched chair closer still, keeping his eye fastened upon her, and indulging in atmospheric passes.

"Don't you come an inch nearer me, Tom Peewit, or I'll shriek," she threatened.

'You couldn't get up out of that chair to save your life," said Peewit, moving his chair a foot closer.

He has since concluded that he was mistaken in that last idea, as his spinster aunt not only got up but rushed out on the front stoop, and alarmed the entire neighborhood and the fire department of the city by her cries of "Fire! police! murder! Lunatic scaped!"

Then two policemen came in, knocked Peewit down, and strapped him to a bed-post; a fire engine arrived, got up steam, and commenced to play on him, and his wife and the servant girl gathered a few things hastily together and fled into one of the neighbor's house.

It took several minutes before the matter was satisfactorily explained, the the engine stopped, Peewit refcused, and the neighborhood quieted down; and our bald-headed little friend has been since heard to remark: [illegible] sense in that mesmerism business as there is in trying to get the man in the moon mad by calling him names."—N. Scarcity of Money.

There is no doubt but the present condition of all kinds of business and industry is fearfully depressed, and it behooved every family to look carefully to their expenses. Spring is coming on when children are liable to Croup, Whooping Cough, etc. Coughs and Colds will prevail everywhere, and Consumption, with other throat and lung diseases, will carry off many.—These diseases should not be neglected. Doctor's bills are expensive, and we would advise our people to use Boschee's German Syrup. It never has failed. One bottle at 75 cents will keep your whole family well during the winter. WEBSTER.

BY WILLIAM CLEAVER WILKINSON.

Fixed, like the pole,
He stood, whatever moved,
Aelf, though sole,
The shock to take and break, [illegible]

The shock he broke;
The multitudinous main
Its waves awoke—
Woke all its waves, and stormed the rock in vain.

To join the waves,
The mustering winds went forth,
From all their caves,
Against him, west, and east, and south, and north.

[illegible]
Of whirlwind, [illegible]
In its cycloid,
[illegible], on that [illegible] strength its strength to try.

And the floods came—
Deep called to deep aloud,
Through the great frame
Of nature, 'twixt the billow and the cloud.

And deluge rolled,
From pole to pole one tide,
Waste, as of old,
And, wallowing, shouldered huge against his side.

The thunderbolt,
As when that Titan world
Rose in revolt,
Shot through the blinding air amain was hurled;

And, whence it slept,
Like a spirit sword unsheathed,
The lightning leapt,
And round him its fierce arms of flame enwreathed.

The rending throes
Of earthquake, to and fro,
From their repose
Rocked the perpetual hills, or laid them low.

And still he stood—
For the vexed planet still,
Created good,
Was whole, and held her course, and had her will.

Around him cloud,
Pale specter of spent storm,
Clung, like a shroud,
And veiled awhile the inviolable form.

But umpire Time,
Serenely wise and just,
With slow, sublime,
Unalterable decision, and august,

Cleansed this away,
And, lo! the glorious front,
In candid day,
Resumed, with solemn joy, its ancient wont.

MY FRIEND, THE TRAMP.

BY BRET HARTE.

I had been sauntering over the clover downs of a certain noted New England seaport. It was a Sabbath morning, so singularly reposeful and gracious—so replete with the significance of the seventh day of rest that even the Sabbath bells ringing a mile away over the salt marshes had little that was monitory, mandatory, or even supplicatory in their drowsy voices. Rather they seemed to call from their cloudy towers, like some renegade Muezzin: "Sleep is better than prayer; sleep on, oh sons of the Puritans! Slumber still, oh deacons and vestrymen. Let, oh let those feet that are swift to wickedness curl up beneath thee; those palms that are itching for the shekels of the ungodly lie clasped beneath thy pillow. Sleep is better than prayer."

And, indeed, though it was high morning, sleep was still in the air. Wrought upon at last by the combined influences of sea, and sky, and atmosphere, I succumbed, and lay down on one of the boulders of a little stony slope that gave upon the sea. The great Atlantic lay before me, not yet quite awake, but slowly heaving with the rythmical expiration of slumber. There was no sail visible in the misty horizon. There was nothing to do but to lie and stare at the unwinking ether.

Suddenly I became aware of the strong fumes of tobacco. Turning my head I saw a pale [illegible] smoke curling up from behind an adjacent boulder. Rising and climbing over the intervening granite, I came upon a little hollow, in which, comfortably extended on the mosses and lichens, lay a powerfully-built man. He was very ragged; he was very dirty; there was a strong suggestion about him of his having too much hair, too much nail, too much perspiration; too much of those superfluous excrescences and exudations that society and civilization strive to keep under. But it was noticeable that he had not much of anything else. It was The Tramp.

With that swift severity with which we always visit rebuke upon the person who happens to present any one of our vices offensively before us, in his own person, I was deeply indignant at his laziness. Perhaps I showed it in my manner, for he rose to a half-sitting attitude, returned my stare apologetically, and made a movement toward knocking the fire from his pipe against the granite.

"Shure, sur, and if I'd balaved that I was trispassin on yer Honor's grounds it's meself that would hev laid down on the say shore and takin' the salt waves for me blankits. But's sivinteen miles I've walked this blessed noight, with nothin' to sustain me, and hevin a mortal wakeness to fight wid in me bowels, by reason of starvation, and only a bit o' baccy that the Widdy Maloney giv me at the cross roads, to kape me up intoirly. But it was the dark day I left me home in Milwaukee to walk to Boston, and if ye'll oblige a lone man who has left a wife and six children in Milwaukee, wid the loan of 25 cints, furninst the time he gits wurruk, God'll be good o ye."

It instantly flashed through my mind that the man before me had the previous night partaken of the kitchen hospitality of my little cottage two miles away. That he presented himself in the guise of a distressed fisherman, mulcted of his wages by an inhuman Captain; that he had a wife lying sick of consumption in the next village, and two children, one of them a cripple, wandering in the streets of Boston. I remember that this tremendous indictment against Fortune touched the family, and that the distressed fisherman was provided with clothes, food, and some small change. The food and small change had disappeared, but the garments for the consumptive wife, where were they? He had been using them for a pillow.

I instantly pointed out this fact, and charged him with the deception. To my surprise he took it quietly and even a little complacently. "Bedad, yer roight; ye see, sir (confidentially), ye see, sir, until I get to wor-ruk, and its wor-ruk I'm lukin for, I have to desave now and thin to shute the locality. Ah, God save us, but on the say coast thay'r that har-rud upon thim that don't belong to the say."

I ventured to suggest that a strong, healthy man like him might have found work somewhere between Milwaukee and Boston.

"Ah, but ye see I get free passage on a freight train, and didn't sthop. It was in the Aist that I expicted to find wor-ruk."

"Have you any trade?"

"Trade, is it? I'm a brickmaker. God knows, and many's the [illegible] I've had at makin' bricks in Milwaukee. Shure, I'm as aisy a hand at it as any man. Maybe yer Honor might know of a kiln hereabouts?"

Now, to my certain knowledge, there was not a brick kiln within fifty miles of that spot, and of all unlikely places to find one would have been this sandy peninsula, given up to the summer residences of a few wealthy people. Yet I could not help admiring the assumption of the scamp, who knew this fact as well as myself. But I said, "I can give you work for a day or two," and, bidding him gather up his sick wife's apparel, led the way across the downs to my cottage. At first I think the offer took him by surprise, and gave him some consternation, but he presently recovered his spirits, and almost instantly his speech. "Ah, wor-ruk, is it? God be praised: its meself that's ready and willin'. Though maybe me hand is spoilt wid brick-making."

I assured him that the work I would give him would require no delicate manipulation, and so we fared on over the sleepy downs. But I could not help noticing that, although an invalid, I was a much better pedestrian than my companion, frequently leaving him behind, and that, even as a "tramp," he was etymologically an impostor. He had a way of lingering beside the fences we had to climb over as if to continue more confidentially the history of his misfortunes and troubles, which he was delivering to me during our homeward walk, and I noticed that he could seldom resist the invitation of a mossy boulder or a tussock of salt grass. "Ye see, sir," he would say, suddenly sitting down; "it's along uv me misfortunes beginning in Milwaukee that——" and it was not until I was out of hearing that he would languidly gather his traps again and saunter after me. When I reached my own garden gate he leaned for a moment over it, with both of his powerful arms extended downward, and said, "Ah, but it's a blessin' that Sunday comes to give rest fur the wake and the weary, and thim as walks sivinteen miles to get it." Of course I took the hint. There was evidently no work to be had from my friend the tramp that day. Yet his countenance brightened as he saw the limited extent of my domain, and observed that the garden, so-called, was only a flower-bed about twenty-five by ten. As he had doubtless before this been utilized to the extent of his capacity in digging, he had probably expected that kind of work, and I dare say I discomfited him by pointing him to an almost leveled stone wall about twenty feet long, with the remark that his work would be the rebuilding of that stone wall with stone brought from the neighboring slopes. In a few moments he was comfortably provided for in the kitchen, where the cook, a woman of his own nativity, apparently "chaffed" him with a raillery that was to me quite unintelligible. Yet I noticed that when, at sunset, he accompanied Bridget to the spring for water, ostentatiously flourishing the empty bucket in his hand, and when they returned in the gloaming Bridget was carrying the water, and my friend, the Tramp, was some paces behind her cheerfully "colloguing," and picking blackberries.

At 7 the next morning he started in cheerfully to work. At 9 a. m. he had placed three large stones on the first course in position, an hour having been spent in looking for a pick and hammer, and in the incident "chaffing" with Bridget. At 10 o'clock I went to overlook his work; it was a rash action, as it caused him to respectfully doff his hat, discontinue his labors, and lean back against the fence in cheerful and easy conversation. "Are ye fond uv blackberries, Captain?" I told him that the children were in the habit of getting them from the meadow beyond—hoping to estop the suggestion I knew was coming. "Ah, but Captain, it's meself that with wandering and having nothin' to pass me lips but the berries I'd pick from the hedges—its meself knows where to find thim. Shure, it's yer chider, and feine boys they are, Captain, that are beseching me to go wid 'em to the place, knownst only to meself." It is unnecessary to say that he triumphed. After the manner of vagabonds of all degrees, he had enlisted the women and children on his side—and my friend the Tramp had his own way. He departed at 11 and returned at 4 p. m. with a tin dinner pail half filled. On interrogating the boys it appeared that they had "a bully time," but on cross-examination it came out that they had picked the berries. From 4 to 6 three more stones were laid, and the arduous labors of the day were over. As I stood looking at the first course of six stones my friend, the Tramp, stretched his strong arms out to their fullest extent and said: "Ay, but it's wor-ruk that's good for me: gin me wor-ruk, and it's all I'll be, sakin' fur."

I ventured to suggest that he had not yet accomplished much.

"Wait till to-morrow. Ah, but ye'll see thin. It's me hand that's yet onasy wid brick-making and sthrange to the shtones. Av ye'll wait till to-morror!"

Unfortunately I did not wait. An engagement took me away at an early hour, and, when I rode up to my cottage at noon, my eyes were greeted with the astonishing spectacle of my two boys hard at work laying the courses of the stone wall, assisted by Bridget and Norah, who were dragging stones from the hillsides, while comfortably stretched on the top of the wall lay my friend, the Tramp, quietly overseeing the operations with lazy and humorous comment. For an instant I was foolishly indignant, but he soon brought me to my senses. "Shure, sir, it's only larnin' the boys the habits uv industhry I was—and may they niver know, be the same token, what it is to wor-ruk for the bread betune their lips. Shure it's but makin' em think it was play I was. As for the colleens beyint in the kitchen, sure isn't it betther they was helpin your Honor here than colloguing with themselves inside?"

Nevertheless, I thought it expedient to forbid henceforth any interruption of servants or children with my friend's "wor-ruk." Perhaps it was the result of this embargo that the next morning early the Tramp wanted to see me.

"And it's sorry I am to say it to ye, surr," he began, "but it's the handlin' of this stun that's desthroyin' me touch at the brickmakin', and it's better I should lave ye and find wor-ruk at me own thrade. For it's wor-ruk I'm nadin'. It isn't myself, Captin, to ate the bread of oidleness. And so good-by to ye, and if it's 50 cints ye can be givin' me on it I'll find a [illegible]—it's God that'll repay ye."

He got the money. But he got also conditionally a note from me to my next neighbor, a wealthy retired physician, possessed of a large domain—a man eminently practical and business-like in his management of it. He employed many laborers on the sterile waste he called his "farm," and it occurred to me that if there really was any work in my friend the Tramp, which me own indolence and preoccupation had failed to bring out, he was the man to do it.

I met him a week after. It was with some embarrassment that I inquired after my friend, the Tramp. "O, yes," he said, reflectively, "let's see—he came Monday and left me Thursday. He was, I think, a stout, strong man, a well-meaning, good-humored fellow, but afflicted with a most singular variety of diseases. The first day I put him at work in the stables he developed chills and fever caught in the swamps of Louisiana—"

"Excuse me," I said hurriedly—"you mean in Milwaukee!"

"I know what I'm talking about," returned the Doctor, testily; "he told me his whole wretched story; his escape from the Confederate service; the attack upon him by armed negroes; his concealment in the bayous and swamps—"

"Go on, Doctor," I said, feebly; "you were speaking of his work."

"Yes—well, his system was full of malaria; the first day I had him wrapped up in blankets and dosed with quinine. The next day he was taken with all the symptoms of cholera morbus, and I had to keep him upon brandy and capsicum. Rheumatism set in on the following day and incapacitated him for work, and I concluded I had better give him a note to the director of the City Hospital than keep him here. As a pathological study he was good, but as I was looking for a man to keep about the stable I couldn't afford to keep him in both capacities."

As I never could really tell when the Doctor was in joke or in earnest I dropped the subject. And so my friend the Tramp gradually faded from my memory, not, however, without leaving behind him in the barn, where he had slept, a lingering flavor of whisky, onions, and fluffiness. But in two weeks this had gone, and the "Shebang" (as my friends irreverently termed my habitation) knew him no more. Yet it was pleasant to think of him as having returned to his family at Milwaukee, or making his Louisiana house once more happy with his presence, or again tempting the fish-producing main—this time with a noble and equitable Captain.

It was a lovely August morning when I rode across the sandy peninsula to visit a certain noted family, whereof all the sons were valiant and the daughters beautiful. The front of the house was deserted, but on the rear verandah I heard the rustle of gowns, and above it arose what seemed to be the voice of Ulysses, reciting his wanderings. There was no mistaking that voice—it was my friend the Tramp.

From what I could hastily gather from his speech, he had walked from St. John, N. B., to rejoin a distressed wife in New York, who was, however, living with opulent but objectionable relatives. "An' shure, Miss, I wouldn't be asking ye the loan of a cint if I could get wor-ruk at me trade of carpet-wavin'—and maybe ye know of some manufacthory where they wave carpets beyant here. Ah, Miss, and if ye don't give me a cint, it's enough for the loikes of me to know that me troubles has brought the tears in the most beautiful oiyes in the wur-ruld, and God bless ye for it, Miss!"

Now I knew that the most beautiful eyes in the world belonged to one of the most sympathetic and tenderest hearts in the world, and I felt that common justice demanded my interference between it and one of the biggest scamps in the world. So, without waiting to be announced by the servant, I opened the door and joined the group on the verandah.

If I expected to touch the conscience of my friend the Tramp by a dramatic entrance, I failed utterly! For no sooner did he see me than he instantly gave vent to a howl of delight, and, falling on his knees before me, grasped my hand and turned oratorically to the ladies.

"Oh, but it's Himself—Himself that has come as a witness to me charackther! Oh, but it's Himself that lifted me four wakes ago, when I was lyin' with a mortal wakeness on the say coast and tuk me to his house. Oh, but it's Himself that shupported me over the faldes, and whin the chills and faver came on me and I shivered wid the cold, it was Himself, God bless him, as sthripped the coat off his back, and giv it me, sayin', 'Tak it, Dinnis, its stharved with the cowld say air ye'll be entoirly.' Ah, but look at him—will ye, Miss! Look at his swate, modist face—a blushin' like your own, Miss. Ah! look at him, will ye? He'll be denyin' of it in a minit—may the blessin' uv God folly him. Look at him, Miss! Ah, but its a swate pair ye'd make! (the rascal knew I was a married man). Ah, Miss, if ye could see him wroightin' day and night with such an illigant hand of his own—(he had evidently believed from the gossip of my servants that I was a professor of chirography)—if ye could see him, Miss, as I have, ye'd be proud of him."

He stopped out of breath. I was so completely astounded I could say nothing; the tremendous indictment I had framed to utter as I opened the door vanished completely. And as the Most Beautiful Eyes on the Wur-ruld turned gratefully to mine—well——

I still retained enough principle to ask the ladies to withdraw, while I would take upon myself the duty of examining into the case of my friend, the Tramp, and giving him such relief as was required. (I did not know until afterward, however, that the rascal had already despoiled their scant purses of $3.50.) When the door was closed upon them I turned upon him.

"You infernal rascal!"

"Ah, Captain, and would ye be refusin' me a carrakther, and me givin' ye such a one as Oi did?! God save us! but if ye'd hav' seen the luk that the purty one give ye. Well, before the chills and faver bruk me spirits entirely, when I was a young man, and makin' me tin dollars a week brick makin', its meself that wud huv given——"

"I consider," I broke in, "that a dollar is a fair price for your story, and, as I shall have to take it all back and expose you before the next twenty-four hours pass, I think you had better hasten to Milwaukee, New York, or Louisiana."

I handed him the dollar. "Mind, I don't want to see your face again."

"Ye won't, Captain."

And I did not.

But it so chanced that later in the season, when the migratory inhabitants had flown to their hot-air registers in Boston and Providence, I breakfasted with one who had lingered. It was a certain Boston lawyer—replete with principle, honesty, self-discipline, statistics, æsthetics, and a perfect consciousness of possessing all these virtues, and a full recognition of their market values. I think he tolerated me as a kind of foreigner, gently but firmly waiving all argument on any topic, frequently distrusting my facts, generally my deductions, and always my ideas. In conversation he always appeared to descend only half way down a long moral and intellectual staircase, and always delivered his conclusions over the balusters.

I had been speaking of my friend, the Tramp. "There is but one way of treating that class of impostors; it is simply to recognise the fact that the law calls him a 'vagrant,' and makes his trade a misdemeanor. Any sentiment on the other side renders you particeps criminis. I don't know but an action would lie against you for encouraging tramps. Now, I have an efficacious way of dealing with these gentry." He rose and took a double-barreled fowling-piece from the chimney. "When a tramp appears on my property I warn him off. If he persists I fire on him—as I would on any criminal trespasser."

"Fire on him?" I echoed, in alarm.

"Yes—but with powder only! Of course he doesn't know that. But he doesn't come back."

It struck me for the first time that possibly many other of my friend's arguments might be only blank cartridges, and used to frighten off other trespassing intellects.

"Of course, if the Tramp still persisted I would be justified in using shot. Last evening I had a visit from one. He was coming over the wall. My shotgun was efficacious; you should have seen him run!"

It was useless to argue with so positive a mind, and I dropped the subject. After breakfast I strolled over the downs, my friend promising to join me as soon as he arranged some household business.

It was a lovely, peaceful morning, not unlike the day when I first met my friend the Tramp. The hush of a great benediction lay on land and sea. A few white sails twinkled afar, but sleepily—one or two large ships were creeping in lazily—like my friend the Tramp. A voice behind me startled me.

My host had rejoined me. His face, however, looked a little troubled.

"I just now learned something of importance," he began; "it appears that with all my precautions that Tramp has visited my kitchen and the servants have entertained him. Yesterday morning, it appears, while I was absent he had the audacity to borrow my gun to go duck shooting. At the end of two or three hours he returned with two ducks and—the gun."

"That was, at least, honest."

"Yes—but! That fool of a girl says that, as he handed back the gun, he told her it was all right, and that he had loaded it up again to save the master trouble."

"I think I showed my concern in my face," for he added, hastily, "It was only duck-shot—a few wouldn't hurt him!"

Nevertheless, we both walked on in silence for a moment.

"I thought the gun kicked a little, he said at last, musingly; "but the idea of—Hallo! what's this?"

He had stopped before the hollow where I had first seen my Tramp. It was deserted, but on the mosses there were spots of blood and fragments of an old gown, blood-stained, as if used for bandages. I looked at it closely; it was the gown intended for the consumptive wife of my friend, the Tramp.

But my host was already nervously tracking the blood-stains that on rock, moss and boulder were steadily leading toward the sea. When I overtook him at last on the shore, he was standing before a flat rock, on which lay a bundle I recognized, tied up in a handkerchief, and a crooked grapevine stick.

"He may have come here to wash his wounds—salt is a styptic," said my host, who had recovered his correct precision of statement.

I said nothing, but looked toward the sea. Whatever secret lay hid in its breast, it kept it fast. Whatever its calm eyes had seen that summer night, it gave no reflection now. It lay there passive, imperturbable and reticent. But my friend, the Tramp, was gone!—New York Sun.

Arctic Expedition.

At the extra session of Congress, says a Washington dispatch, a vigorous effort will be made to get an appropriation for Capt. Howgate's Arctic expedition. Capt. Howgate is offered a suitable vessel for the transportation of fifty men and their provisions, outfits and other necessary material for a three-years' stay to Lady Franklin bay for the sum of $18,000. The vessel offered is a propeller of 658 tons burden, copper fastened throughout, draws fourteen feet of water loaded, and under way makes from ten to twelve knots per hour. She can be made ready for the expedition in ten days from the receipt of notice. The sum asked is high, even when the unusual risks incurred in navigating the Arctic seas are taken into consideration. A three years' supply of provisions will cost, at current wholesale rates, $27,000, and the amount needed for the purchase of buildings for the colony, boats, sledges, instruments, dogs, and other essentials, is estimated at $10,000, making an aggregate of $55,000 for the expedition, exclusive of any compensation to be tendered the hardy adventurers who will consecrate themselves to the work of discovery.

"WHAT is the matter, Julia? you look as sorrowful as a sick lapdog!" "Oh, don't perplex me, that's a dear! my grief is too great for utterance. I've had such an awful vision! I actually dreamed that Rosa Smith had got a new silk dress!"

Important Civil Rights Decision.

An important decision affecting railway companies has just been rendered in the United States District Court at Baltimore by Judge Giles. Harriet Culley and seventeen other negroes sued the Baltimore and Ohio Company to recover $500 damages each, for compelling them to ride in a smoking car while returning on commutation tickets from a point on the Metropolitan branch. The suit was brought under the Supplemental Civil Rights bill, passed by Congress March 1, 1875. Among many witnesses examined was President Garrett, who said that after the Civil Rights bill was passed instructions were given to make no distinction on account of color with passengers on the road or its connections. While the defense in its testimony endeavored to show, but did not fully establish it, that no distinction had been made in the Culley case, yet counsel for defendant relied on the unconstitutionality of the act of Congress. Judge Giles gave an elaborate opinion, reviewing all similar cases known to the law, and instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, under the following ruling: The act of Congress of March 1, 1875, under which this action is brought, so far as it seeks to inflict penalties for the violation of any or all rights which belong to citizens of a State and not citizens of the United States, as such, was the exercise of a power not authorized by any provision of the constitution of the United States, as the privilege to use for local travel any public conveyance is not a right arising under the constitution of the United States. There can be no recovery of the penalty sued for in this case, and the jury will render their verdict for the defendant. A verdict in accordance with these instructions was rendered.

The President and the Colored People.

A delegation of prominent colored men, says a Washington correspondent, "called upon the President to tender their thanks for the appointment of Fred Douglass as Marshal of the District of Columbia. The Chairman, in a brief address, explained the object of the visit and said the appointment was gratifying to the colored people, because by it he not only recognized their claims but struck a blow at the prejudice of caste, and they wished him success in his policy of reconciliation. The President said in reply that in appointing Mr. Douglass his object was to show to the country that it was his purpose to fully carry out the declaration of his inaugural. The amendments to the constitution must be strictly adhered to and all citizens protected in their rights. He referred to the appointment of colored persons, and said that no discrimination must be made on account of color. Should any public officer having a position to be bestowed make any such discrimination he should consider it sufficient cause for his removal. In conclusion he referred to his policy of reconciliation and expressed his confidence in its success."

EVANGELIST BURNHAM was annoyed by a crying baby, while exhorting at Tylerville, Jefferson county, N. Y., recently, and told the mother to remove the child. The people near by told the woman to remain, and the gentle Burnham donned his hat, coat and overshoes, and left the congregation to the stubbornness of their hard hearts.

Songs of Spring.

As one after another of the wild flowers come back to greet us, peeping out of the grass or reaching toward us from shrub or spray, we feel as we do when dear old friends return to us after long absence. The flowers are our friends truly; for everything that has life in it is related to us in some way, and bears some message of love to us from Him without whom neither flowers nor human beings would be alive.

All true poets of nature have felt this, and address the flowers as if they were companions, neighbors or teachers.

Scarcely a more beautiful out-of-door poem of this kind ever has been written than Horace Smith's "Hymn to the Flowers," from which these verses are taken:

Your voiceless lips, O flowers! are living preachers:
Each cup a pulpit, and each leaf a book,
Supplying to my fancy numerous teachers,
From loneliest nook.

'Neath cloistered boughs each floral bell that swingeth,
And tolls its perfume on the passing air,
Makes Sabbath in the fields, and ever ringeth
A call to prayer.

The songs of spring are none the less enjoyable for being old—very old indeed.

In Palestine, thousands of years ago, they welcomed her coming just as we do now. A poet-king of that country wrote rejoicingly: "For lo! the winter is past, the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land."

Perhaps the violet has had more poems written about her than any flower except the rose. How can we help saying "her" of this lowly, sweet-breathed child of the meadow and road-side?

The air begins to be as sweet as if the breezes of another world were blown through ours when the violets unfold. This, too, was noticed long ago. Shakspeare speaks of

The sweet south
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odor.

And Christina Rossetti writes to-day:

O wind, where have you been,
That you blow so sweet?
Among the violets
Which blossom at your feet.

The honeysuckle waits
For summer and for heat;
But violets in the chilly spring
Make the turf so sweet!

Do you know Willis' "April Violets?" Here is part of it. The delicate odor of the flowers seems to steal upon you as you read:

I have found violets. April hath come on,
And the cool winds feel softer, and the rain
Falls in the beaded drops of summer-time.
You may hear birds at morning, and at eve
The tame dove lingers till the twilight falls,
Cooing upon the eaves, and drawing in
His beautiful, bright neck; and, from the hills,
A murmur like the hoarseness of the sea
Tells the release of waters, and the earth
Sends up a pleasant smell, and the dry leaves
Are lifted by the grass; and so I know
That Nature, with her delicate ear, hath heard
The dropping of the velvet foot of spring.
Take of my violets! I found them where
The liquid south stole o'er them, on a bank
That lean'd to running water. There's to me
A daintiness about these early flowers,
That touches me like poetry. They blow
With such a simple loveliness among
The common herbs of pasture, and breathe out
Their lives so unobtrusively, like hearts
Whose beatings are too gentle for the world.
I love to go in the capricious days
Of April and hunt violets, when the rain
Is in the blue cups trembling, and they nod
So gracefully to the kisses of the wind.

Barry Cornwall says this lovely thing about the violet:

She comes, the first, the fairest thing
That heaven upon the earth doth fling,
Ere winter's star has set;
She dwells behind her leafy screen,
And gives as angels give, unseen—
The violet.

Faster than the flowers come the birds. As early as the bluebird, honest Robin Redbreast and his wife are here, hopping up and down the garden-walk, turning their heads this way and that, as they consider their prospects for house-building. High in the leafless tree-top—out of a snow-cloud sometimes—you hear the song-sparrow's heavenly carol, so full of hope and gladness! The sweetest and one of the most social of our field minstrels, he has a song for all seasons, and everybody who listens to him is charmed. It is a comfort to know that he is going to stay with us through midsummer, long after most other birds are silent, or have flown away.

The songsters gather in throngs, with their gay or tender ballads, each so different from the rest—wren, swallow, linnet, thrush, oriole—and none of them dearer or merrier than the bobolink, the Robert Burns among bird-poets, whose warble follows the track of the plow, and ripples along the edges of the corn-field. —St. Nicholas for April.

Emperor William's Eightieth Birthday.

The 80th birthday (March 22) of William, Emperor of Germany and King of Prussia, was celebrated at Berlin with great festivities. All nations of Europe were represented by special envoys to convey their congratulations and pay their respects to the octogenarian monarch; and, what with the attendance of the numerous German Princes with their families, Berlin was fairly overrun with royalty and nobility. During the day the city was profusely decorated, and in the evening banquets and illuminations were in order. Emperor William, in spite of his full four-score years, seems to have been able to bear his part in the protracted festivities, receiving in person, from 10 o'clock in the morning until 2 in the afternoon, the immense throng of Princes and dignitaries who paid their respects to the venerable and august ruler of the most powerful nation of Europe. He has occupied the throne for nearly twenty years, having in 1858 been appointed Regent upon the retiring of his brother, Frederick William IV., on account of mental aberration. By the death of the latter without issue, Jan. 2, 1861, William became King of Prussia, and on the 18th of January, 1871, he was proclaimed Emperor of United Germany, in the palace of the French Kings at Versailles.

Investigating the Grasshopper.

The President has appointed the following persons as members of the Grasshopper Commission: Prof. S. V. Riley, of St. Louis, known for his labors in economic entomology; Prof. A. S. Packard, Jr., of Salem, Mass., editor of the American Naturalist, who is to be Secretary of the commission; and Prof. Cyrus Thomas, of Carbondale, Ill., State Entomologist. The commission will have its quarters at Washington, with a Western office in St. Louis. Prof. Riley proposes to take the area east of the mountains and south of the fortieth parallel with British America. Prof. Thomas will take the country north of the fortieth parallel to the British American line, excepting Montana. Prof. Packard's field will more particularly cover Montana Territory, Idaho and Utah. The two principal objects of the commission are, first, to ascertain what agency can be brought to bear in facilitating the destruction of the eggs of the insects; second, to discover where the locusts breed. It is known that Montana is one of the fields in which they breed largely, but in all probability the largest breeding ground is in British America. That country being difficult to explore, it is likely that the commission will try to secure the co-operation of the British Government.

How Do Birds Migrate?

Some birds fly only in the day-time; others, such as the fly-catchers, kingfishers, whip-poor-wills and night-hawks, do their traveling at night. Many journey alone or in pairs, although most unite into flocks and travel in company. The migrations of the wild goose are especially interesting. When the time for migration has come, the wild geese assemble and spend some time in a loud and animated discussion of the journey. Then they all rise into the air and arrange themselves in two long lines, meeting like the sides of the letter V. The leader takes up his position at the point where the lines meet, and the birds begin their flight, the point of the V going first, so that the leader is in advance of all the rest of the flock. He is always an old gander; only, as this position is very fatiguing, one leader does not occupy it very long, but, as soon as he becomes tired, falls back to the rear and allows another to take his place. Geese, while upon their migrations, fly very rapidly—according to some estimates, at the rate of 120 miles an hour, or two miles a minute. They generally rest by some pond or river a part of the night, but sometimes they fly all night as well as all day. In the day-time, when the weather is clear, they fly at a great height, often so far up that they are invisible to us, and their loud clamor is the only sign we have that they are passing. At night, or in foggy weather, they fly much nearer the earth, and when the air is very foggy they often become lost, and settle to wait for the mists to clear away.

The distances traveled by different birds vary very much. The robin, red-winged blackbird, and the like, go only far enough to find warmth and food, and one or two warm days in early spring are enough to call them back, after which they often go south again. The red-winged blackbird is found during the whole winter as far north as Virginia, particularly near the sea-coast and in the vicinity of large rice and corn-fields.

Other birds travel much farther in their annual journeys. In the summer the humming-bird is found as far north as Hudson's bay, but it spends its winters in those tropical, or almost tropical, regions where the flowers bloom the year through. As spring advances, this bird travels northward from Mexico by short journeys, keeping pace with the opening flowers, which afford it an unfailing supply of honey and insect food.

Many other birds also make their journey in short flights. This is the case with the robin and the blue-bird, although each is able to fly a great distance without rest, for they are said to visit Bermuda, about 300 miles from the nearest land.

Most birds make their migrations by flight, but a few do not; our coots and rails perform at least part of the journey on foot.

All the birds so far spoken of undertake their journey at certain definite seasons, and their line of march is north and south; but there are some birds which make migrations of a different character. Wild pigeons, for instance, move in whatever direction they are likely to find food, as often east or west as north or south, and these journeys take place at any time when there is a scarcity of food.—St. Nicholas Magazine for April.

Why Do Birds Migrate?

Inability to stand the cold of our winters is generally supposed to be the reason of this migration, and in many cases this is true. A humming-bird or a summer yellow-bird would die very soon if it should be exposed to a winter storm; but we often have very cold and stormy weather after our earlier spring birds have returned, yet they live through it without appearing to suffer very greatly. Birds are very well protected from the cold by their feathers and their warm blood, and the stray robins and blackbirds which occasionally winter with us do not have any difficulty in withstanding the cold. Hence we must look for some other reason for their migration. Most of our migratory land-birds feed upon insects, worms, and small fruit and seeds, and, as these cannot be obtained in the winter, the birds must either move southward when the home supply begins to fail or starve. Lack of food, not cold, is the reason of their migration. Water-birds seem to be able to endure any amount of cold; a duck will swim contentedly for hours, entirely surrounded by ice, and not seem to mind the cold at all. Many of our common water-birds are met with in summer far beyond the Arctic circle, so that inability to stand the climate cannot be the reason why they leave us in the fall for the South. Marsh-birds, like the snipe, the coot, and the plover, and many of our water-birds, such as the wood-duck, feed upon the small animals and plants which they find in shallow water, or in the mud; but as soon as the frost comes all the shallow water is changed to ice, so that this supply of food is cut off, and the birds must go to a warmer country.

We can see, then, that birds migrate from lack of food, and not on account of the cold weather, for those water-birds which, like the gull, are able to catch fish in deep water, stay with us through the whole winter.—St. Nicholas for April.

The Pennsylvania oil country seems to be overstocked with laborers. The Edenburg Herald says about one person in fifteen seeking employment at that point gets it.

A company has been organized to construct railway and telegraph lines from Trinidad to El Moro, Col., and work will be commenced as soon as the frost leaves the ground.

Twenty rounds were fought between two men employed in Roach's ship-yard at Chester, Pa., the other day, when the wives of the combatants put in an appearance and led their brutish husbands home.

A recent event in Nevada was the marriage of the Piute Princess, Sarah Winnemucca, to a buck known as Bob. She had previously been the bride of an officer of the United States army, Lieut. Bartlett.

The fish of Wallows lake, in California, are blood red in color and very fat. There are only four lakes known in which this fish is found—Payette, in Idaho, a lake in Maine, one in Scotland, and Wallows lake.

A party of Chinese fishermen caught sight of a sea serpent near the Coronada islands, in the Pacific, on Feb. 21. Length of body, 50 feet; length of head, 10 feet; length of tail, 100 feet; diameter, 3 feet; color, brown.

WHERE IS GOD?

"Oh, where is the sea?" the fishes cried,
As they swam the crystal clearness through,
"We've heard from of old of the ocean's tide,
And we long to look on the waters blue.
The wise ones speak of the infinite sea;
Oh, who can tell us if such there be?"
The lark flew up in the morning bright,
And sung and balanced on sunny wings;
And this was its song: "I see the light,
I look o'er a world of beautiful things;
But flying and singing everywhere,
In vain I have searched to find the air."
—Scribner for April.

They have had a singular electoral tribunal in a village of Awa, Japan. The neighborhood was harassed by a midnight robber, whom nobody could detect. The head of the hamlet summoned the entire male population under his charge, and directed every man to write the name of the person whom he suspected and deposit the ticket in a box. Fifteen ballots bore the name of Abe Tanihei, the rest being blanks. The man whom everybody distrusted was so overcome with astonishment that he made full confession and went to prison.

SPRING SONG.

From the cold stillness of the night,
Where icy caverns, fields of snow,
And shadowy visions, wan and white,
Make life a dull and ghostly glow;
A song that shames this song of mine,
More light than any bird that flies,
Flows gently past the leafless pine,
Then faintly flutters, weeps and dies.
But soon to flowering life new-born,
It thrills the snow-bound dreams of death;
And all the golden light of morn
Throbs with a mild, exultant breath.
Sweet, magic music of the spring,
Awakening of diviner day—
The sunlit souls of angels wing
To blooming earth their rosy way.

A Big Estate.

James Irvine is the fortunate owner of the San Joaquin and Lomas de Santiago ranches in Los Angeles county, containing 95,000 acres, and of 12,000 acres in the Santa Ana ranch adjoining. In other words, he owns 107,000 acres of as fertile soil as is to be found in Southern California, comprising mountains, valleys, coast-line, and mesa lands. To give a better idea of this estate, we may say that it is twenty-two miles long by nine miles wide. It is all within Los Angeles county, and, being the fairly-earned property of a pioneer settler, he is entitled to its full enjoyment.—San Francisco Post.

WEBSTER.

BY WILLIAM CLEAVER WILKINSON.

Fixed, like the pole,
He stood, whatever moved,
As if, though sole,
The shock to take and break,

The shock he braved;
The multitudinous main
Its waves awoke—
Woke all its waves, and stormed the rock in vain.

To join the waves,
The mustering winds went forth,
From all their caves,
Against him, west, and east, and south, and north.

[illegible]
Of whirlwind, [illegible]
In its cyclone
[illegible]

And the floods came—
[illegible]
Through the great frame
Of nature, broke the billow and the cloud.

And deluge rolled,
[illegible]
Winds, as of old,
And, [illegible] shouldered huge against his side.

The thunderbolt,
As when that Titan world
Rose in revolt,
Shot through the kindling air amain was hurled;

[illegible]
Like a spent round unexploded,
The lightning leapt,
And round him its fierce arms of flame enwreathed.

The rending throes
Of earthquake, to and fro,
From their repose,
Rocked the perpetual hills, or laid them low.

And still he stood—
For the round planet still,
Created good,
Was whole, and held her course, and had her will.

Around him cloud,
Pale specter of spent storm,
Clung, like a shroud,
And veiled awhile the inviolable form.

But umpire Time,
Serenely wise and just,
With slow, sublime,
Unalterable decision, and august,

Cleansed this away,
And, lo! the glorious front,
In candid day,
Resumed, with solemn joy, its ancient wont.
—Scribner for April.

MY FRIEND, THE TRAMP.

BY BRET HARTE.

I had been sauntering over the clover downs of a certain noted New England seaport. It was a Sabbath morning, so singularly reposeful and gracious—so replete with the significance of the seventh day of rest that even the Sabbath bells ringing a mile away over the salt marshes had little that was monitory, mandatory, or even supplicatory in their drowsy voices. Rather they seemed to call from their cloudy towers, like some renegade Muezzin: "Sleep is better than prayer; sleep on, oh sons of the Puritans! Slumber still, oh deacons and vestrymen. Let, oh let those feet that are swift to wickedness curl up beneath thee; those palms that are itching for the shekels of the ungodly lie clasped beneath thy pillow. Sleep is better than prayer."

And, indeed, though it was high morning, sleep was still in the air. Wrought upon at last by the combined influences of sea, and sky, and atmosphere, I succumbed, and lay down on one of the boulders of a little stony slope that gave upon the sea. The great Atlantic lay before me, not yet quite awake, but slowly heaving with the rythmical expiration of slumber. There was no sail visible in the misty horizon. There was nothing to do but to lie and stare at the unwinking ether.

Suddenly I became aware of the strong fumes of tobacco. Turning my head I saw a pale blue smoke curling up from behind an adjacent boulder. Rising and climbing over the intervening granite, I came upon a little hollow, in which, comfortably extended on the mosses and lichens, lay a powerfully-built man. He was very ragged; he was very dirty; there was a strong suggestion about him of his having too much hair, too much nail, too much perspiration; too much of those superfluous excrescences and exudations that society and civilization strive to keep under. But it was noticeable that he had not much of anything else. It was The Tramp.

With that swift severity with which we always visit rebuke upon the person who happens to present any one of our vices offensively before us, in his own person, I was deeply indignant at his laziness. Perhaps I showed it in my manner, for he rose to a half-sitting attitude, returned my stare apologetically, and made a movement toward knocking the fire from his pipe against the granite.

"Shure, sur, and if I'd beleaved that I was thrispassin on yer Honor's grounds it's meself that would hev laid down on the say shore and takin' the salt waves for me blankits. But's sivinteen miles I've walked this blessed noight, with nothin' to sustain me, and hevin a mortal wakeness to fight wid in me bowels, by reason of starvation, and only a bit o' baccy that the Widdy Maloney giv me at the cross roads, to kape me up intoirly. But it was the dark day I left me home in Milwaukee to walk to Boston, and if ye'll oblige a lone man who has left a wife and six children in Milwaukee, wid the loan of 25 cints, furninst the time he gits wurruk, God'll be good o ye."

It instantly flashed through my mind that the man before me had the previous night partaken of the kitchen hospitality of my little cottage two miles away. That he presented himself in the guise of a distressed fisherman, mulcted of his wages by an inhuman Captain; that he had a wife lying sick of consumption in the next village, and two children, one of them a cripple, wandering in the streets of Boston. I remember that this tremendous indictment against Fortune touched the family, and that the distressed fisherman was provided with clothes, food, and some small change. The food and small change had disappeared, but the garments for the consumptive wife, where were they? He had been using them for a pillow.

I instantly pointed out this fact, and charged him with the deception. To my surprise he took it quietly and even a little complacently. "Bedad, yer roight; ye see, sir (confidentially), ye see, sir, until I get to wor-ruk, and its wor-ruk I'm lukin for, I have to desave now and thin to shute the locality. Ah, God save us, but on the say coast they're that hay-rud upon thim that don't belong to the say."

I ventured to suggest that a strong, healthy man like him might have found work somewhere between Milwaukee and Boston.

"Ah, but ye see I get free passage on a freight train, and didn't sthop. It was in the Aist that I expicted to find wor-ruk."

"Have you any trade?"

"Trade, is it? I'm a brickmaker. God [illegible] many's the [illegible] I've [illegible] at makin' bricks in Milwaukee. Sure, I'm [illegible] hand at it [illegible] any man. Maybe yer Honor might know of a kill hereabouts?"

Now, to my certain knowledge, there was not a brick kiln within fifty miles of that spot, and of all unlikely places to find one would have been this sandy peninsula, given up to the summer residences of a few wealthy people. Yet I could not help admiring the assurance of the scamp, who knew this fact as well as myself. But I said, "I can give you work for a day or two," and, bidding him gather up his sick wife's apparel, led the way across the downs to my cottage. At first I think the offer took him by surprise, and gave him some consternation, but he presently recovered his spirits, and almost instantly his speech. "Ah, wur-ruk, is it? God be praised; its meself that's ready and willin'. Though maybe me hand is spoilt wid brick-making."

I assured him that the work I would give him would require no delicate manipulation, and so we fared on over the sleepy downs. But I could not help noticing that, although an invalid, I was a much better pedestrian than my companion, frequently leaving him behind, and that, even as a "tramp," he was etymologically an impostor. He had a way of lingering beside the fences we had to climb over as if to continue more confidentially the history of his misfortunes and troubles, which he was delivering to me during our homeward walk, and I noticed that he could seldom resist the invitation of a mossy boulder or a tussock of salt grass. "Ye see, sir," he would say, suddenly sitting down; "it's along uv me misfortunes beginning in Milwaukee that——" and it was not until I was out of hearing that he would languidly gather his traps again and saunter after me. When I reached my own garden gate he leaned for a moment over it, with both of his powerful arms extended downward, and said, "Ah, but it's a blessin' that Sunday comes to give rest for the wake and the weary, and thim as walks sivinteen miles to get it." Of course I took the hint. There was evidently no work to be had from my friend the tramp that day. Yet his countenance brightened as he saw the limited extent of my domain, and observed that the garden, so-called, was only a flower-bed about twenty-five by ten. As he had doubtless before this been utilized to the extent of his capacity in digging, he had probably expected that kind of work, and I dare say I discomfited him by pointing him to an almost leveled stone wall about twenty feet long, with the remark that his work would be the rebuilding of that stone wall with stone brought from the neighboring slopes. In a few moments he was comfortably provided for in the kitchen, where the cook, a woman of his own nativity, apparently "chaffed" him with a raillery that was to me quite unintelligible. Yet I noticed that when, at sunset, he accompanied Bridget to the spring for water, ostentatiously flourishing the empty bucket in his hand, and when they returned in the gloaming Bridget was carrying the water, and my friend, the Tramp, was some paces behind her cheerfully "colloguing," and picking blackberries.

At 7 the next morning he started in cheerfully to work. At 9 a. m. he had placed three large stones on the first course in position, an hour having been spent in looking for a pick and hammer, and in the incident "chaffing" with Bridget. At 10 o'clock I went to overlook his work; it was a rash action, as it caused him to respectfully doff his hat, discontinue his labors, and lean back against the fence in cheerful and easy conversation. "Are ye fond uv blackberries, Captain?" I told him that the children were in the habit of getting them from the meadow beyond—hoping to estop the suggestion I knew was coming. "Ah, but Captain, it's meself that with wandering and having nothin' to pass me lips but the berries I'd pick from the hedges—its meself knows where to find thim. Shure, it's yer chider, and foine boys they are, Captain, that are beseeching me to go wid 'em to the place, knownst only to meself." It is unnecessary to say that he triumphed. After the manner of vagabonds of all degrees, he had enlisted the women and children on his side—and my friend the Tramp had his own way. He departed at 11 and returned at 4 p. m. with a tin dinner pail half filled. On interrogating the boys it appeared that they had "a bully time," but on cross-examination it came out that they had picked the berries. From 4 to 6 three more stones were laid, and the arduous labors of the day were over. As I stood looking at the first course of six stones my friend, the Tramp, stretched his strong arms out to their fullest extent and said: "Ay, but it's wor-ruk that's good for me: gin me wor-ruk, and it's all I'll be askin' fur."

I ventured to suggest that he had not yet accomplished much.

"Wait till to-morrow. Ah, but ye'll see thin. It's me hand that's yet onasy wid brick-making and sthrange to the shtones. Av ye'll wait till to-morror!"

Unfortunately I did not wait. An engagement took me away at an early hour, and, when I rode up to my cottage at noon, my eyes were greeted with the astonishing spectacle of my two boys hard at work laying the courses of the stone wall, assisted by Bridget and Norah, who were dragging stones from the hillsides, while comfortably stretched on the top of the wall lay my friend, the Tramp, quietly overseeing the operations with lazy and humorous comment. For an instant I was foolishly indignant, but he soon brought me to my senses. "Shure, sir, it's only larnin' the boys the habits uv industhry I was—and may they niver know, be the same token, what it is to wor-ruk for the bread betune their lips. Shure it's but makin' em think it was play I was. As for the colleens beyant in the kitchen, sure isn't it betther they was helpin your Honor here than colloguing with themselves inside?"

Nevertheless, I thought it expedient to forbid henceforth any interruption of servants or children with my friend's "wor-ruk." Perhaps it was the result of this embargo that the next morning early the Tramp wanted to see me.

"And it's sorry I am to say it to ye, surr," he began, "but it's the handlin' of this stun that's desthroyin' me touch at the brickmakin', and it's better I should lave ye and find wor-ruk at me own thrade. For it's wor-ruk I'm nadin'. It isn't meself, Captin, to ate the bread of idleness. And so good-by t'ye, and if it's 50 [illegible] ye can be givin' me [illegible] find a [illegible]—it's God that'll repay ye."

He got the money. But he got also conditionally a note from me to my next neighbor, a wealthy retired physician, possessed of a large domain, a man eminently practical and business-like in his management of it. He employed many laborers on the sterile waste he called his "farm," and it occurred to me that if there really was any work in my friend the Tramp, which my own indolence and preoccupation had failed to bring out, he was the man to do it.

I met him a week after. It was with some [illegible] that I inquired after my friend the Tramp. "O, yes," he said, reflectively, "let's see—he came Monday and left me Thursday. He was, I think, a stout, strong man, a well-meaning, good-humored fellow, but afflicted with a most singular variety of diseases. The first day I put him at work in the stables he developed chills and fever caught in the swamps of Louisiana—"

"Excuse me," I said hurriedly—"you mean in Milwaukee!"

"I know what I'm talking about," returned the Doctor, testily; "he told me his whole wretched story; his escape from the Confederate service; the attack upon him by armed negroes; his concealment in the bayous and swamps—"

"Go on, Doctor," I said, feebly; "you were speaking of his work."

"Yes—well, his system was full of malaria; the first day I had him wrapped up in blankets and dosed with quinine. The next day he was taken with all the symptoms of cholera morbus, and I had to keep him upon brandy and capsicum. Rheumatism set in on the following day and incapacitated him for work, and I concluded I had better give him a note to the director of the City Hospital than keep him here. As a pathological study he was good, but as I was looking for a man to keep about the stable I couldn't afford to keep him in both capacities."

As I never could really tell when the Doctor was in joke or in earnest I dropped the subject. And so my friend the Tramp gradually faded from my memory, not, however, without leaving behind him in the barn, where he had slept, a lingering flavor of whisky, onions, and fluffiness. But in two weeks this had gone, and the "Shebang" (as my friends irreverently termed my habitation) knew him no more. Yet it was pleasant to think of him as having returned to his family at Milwaukee, or making his Louisiana house once more happy with his presence, or again tempting the fish-producing main—this time with a noble and equitable Captain.

It was a lovely August morning when I rode across the sandy peninsula to visit a certain noted family, whereof all the sons were valiant and the daughters beautiful. The front of the house was deserted, but on the rear verandah I heard the rustle of gowns, and above it arose what seemed to be the voice of Ulysses, reciting his wanderings. There was no mistaking that voice—it was my friend the Tramp.

From what I could hastily gather from his speech, he had walked from St. John, N. B., to rejoin a distressed wife in New York, who was, however, living with opulent but objectionable relatives. "An' shure, Miss, I wouldn't be asking ye the loan of a cint if I could get wor-ruk at me trade of carpet-wavin'—and maybe ye know of some manufacthory where they wave carpets beyant here. Ah, Miss, and if ye don't give me a cint, it's enough for the loikes of me to know that me troubles has brought the tears in the most beautiful oiyes in the wur-ruld, and God bless ye for it, Miss!"

Now I knew that the most beautiful eyes in the world belonged to one of the most sympathetic and tenderest hearts in the world, and I felt that common justice demanded my interference between it and one of the biggest scamps in the world. So, without waiting to be announced by the servant, I opened the door and joined the group on the verandah.

If I expected to touch the conscience of my friend the Tramp by a dramatic entrance, I failed utterly! For no sooner did he see me than he instantly gave vent to a howl of delight, and, falling on his knees before me, grasped my hand and turned oratorically to the ladies.

"Oh, but it's Himself—Himself that has come as a witness to me charackther! Oh, but it's Himself that lifted me four wakes ago, when I was lyin' with a mortal wakeness on the say coast and tuk me to his house. Oh, but it's Himself that shupported me over the faldes, and whin the chills and faver came on me and I shivered wid the cold, it was Himself, God bless him, as sthripped the coat off his back, and giv it me, sayin', 'Tak it, Dinnis, its stharved with the cowld say air ye'll be entoirly.' Ah, but look at him—will ye, Miss! Look at his swate, modist face—a blushin' like your own, Miss. Ah! look at him, will ye? He'll be denyin' of it in a minit—may the blessin' uv God folly him. Look at him, Miss! Ah, but its a swate pair ye'd make! (the rascal knew I was a married man). Ah, Miss, if ye could see him wroightin' day and night with such an illigant hand of his own—(he had evidently believed from the gossip of my servants that I was a professor of chirography)—if ye could see him, Miss, as I have, ye'd be proud of him."

He stopped out of breath. I was so completely astounded I could say nothing; the tremendous indictment I had framed to utter as I opened the door vanished completely. And as the Most Beautiful Eyes on the Wur-ruld turned gratefully to mine—well——

I still retained enough principle to ask the ladies to withdraw, while I would take upon myself the duty of examining into the case of my friend, the Tramp, and giving him such relief as was required. (I did not know until afterward, however, that the rascal had already despoiled their scant purses of $3.50.) When the door was closed upon them I turned upon him.

"You infernal rascal!"

"Ah, Captain, and would ye be refusin' me a carraikther, and me givin' ye such a one as Oi did?! God save us! but if ye'd hav' seen the luk that the party one give ye. Well, before the chills and faver bruk me spirits entirely, when I was a young man, and makin' me ten dollars a week brick makin', its meself that wud huv given ——"

"I consider," I broke in, "that a dollar [illegible] fair price for your story, and, as I shall have to take it back and expose you before the next twenty-four hours pass, I think you had better hasten to Milwaukee, New York or Louisiana."

I handed him the dollar. "Mind, I don't want to see your face again."

"Ye won't, Captain."

And I did not.

But it so chanced that later in the season, when the migratory inhabitants had flown to their hot-air registers in Boston and Providence, I breakfasted with one who had lingered. It was a certain Boston lawyer—replete with principle, honesty, self-discipline, statistics, dialectics, and a perfect consciousness of possessing all these virtues and a full recognition of their market values. I think he tolerated me as a kind of foreigner, gently but firmly waiving all argument on any topic, frequently disputing my facts, generally my deductions, and always my ideas. In conversation he always appeared to descend only half way down a long moral and intellectual staircase, and always delivered his conclusions over the balusters.

I had been speaking of my friend, the Tramp. "There is but one way of treating that class of impostors; it is simply to recognize the fact that the law calls him a 'vagrant,' and makes his trade a misdemeanor. Any sentiment on the other side renders you particeps criminis. I don't know but an action would lie against you for encouraging tramps. Now, I have an efficacious way of dealing with these gentry." He rose and took a double-barreled fowling-piece from the chimney. "When a tramp appears on my property I warn him off. If he persists I fire on him—as I would on any criminal trespasser."

"Fire on him?" I echoed, in alarm.

"Yes—but with powder only! Of course he doesn't know that. But he doesn't come back."

It struck me for the first time that possibly many other of my friend's arguments might be only blank cartridges, and used to frighten off other trespassing intellects.

"Of course, if the Tramp still persisted I would be justified in using shot. Last evening I had a visit from one. He was coming over the wall. My shotgun was efficacious; you should have seen him run!"

It was useless to argue with so positive a mind, and I dropped the subject. After breakfast I strolled over the downs, my friend promising to join me as soon as he arranged some household business.

It was a lovely, peaceful morning, not unlike the day when I first met my friend the Tramp. The hush of a great benediction lay on land and sea. A few white sails twinkled afar, but sleepily—one or two large ships were creeping in lazily—like my friend the Tramp. A voice behind me startled me.

My host had rejoined me. His face, however, looked a little troubled.

"I just now learned something of importance," he began; "it appears that with all my precautions that Tramp has visited my kitchen and the servants have entertained him. Yesterday morning, it appears, while I was absent he had the audacity to borrow my gun to go duck shooting. At the end of two or three hours he returned with two ducks and—the gun."

"That was, at least, honest."

"Yes—but! That fool of a girl says that, as he handed back the gun, he told her it was all right, and that he had loaded it up again to save the master trouble."

"I think I showed my concern in my face," for he added, hastily, "It was only duck-shot—a few wouldn't hurt him!"

Nevertheless, we both walked on in silence for a moment.

"I thought the gun kicked a little, he said at last, musingly; "but the idea of—Hallo! what's this?"

He had stopped before the hollow where I had first seen my Tramp. It was deserted, but on the mosses there were spots of blood and fragments of an old gown, blood-stained, as if used for bandages. I looked at it closely; it was the gown intended for the consumptive wife of my friend, the Tramp.

But my host was already nervously tracking the blood-stains that on rock, moss and boulder were steadily leading toward the sea. When I overtook him at last on the shore, he was standing before a flat rock, on which lay a bundle I recognized, tied up in a handkerchief, and a crooked grapevine stick.

"He may have come here to wash his wounds—salt is a styptic," said my host, who had recovered his correct precision of statement.

I said nothing, but looked toward the sea. Whatever secret lay hid in its breast, it kept it fast. Whatever its calm eyes had seen that summer night, it gave no reflection now. It lay there passive, imperturbable and reticent. But my friend, the Tramp, was gone!—New York Sun.

Arctic Expedition.

At the extra session of Congress, says a Washington dispatch, a vigorous effort will be made to get an appropriation for Capt. Howgate's Arctic expedition. Capt. Howgate is offered a suitable vessel for the transportation of fifty men and their provisions, outfits and other necessary material for a three-years' stay to Lady Franklin bay for the sum of $18,000. The vessel offered is a propeller of 658 tons burden, copper fastened throughout, draws fourteen feet of water loaded, and under way makes from ten to twelve knots per hour. She can be made ready for the expedition in ten days from the receipt of notice. The sum asked is high, even when the unusual risks incurred in navigating the Arctic seas are taken into consideration. A three years' supply of provisions will cost, at current wholesale rates, $27,000, and the amount needed for the purchase of buildings for the colony, boats, sledges, instruments, dogs, and other essentials, is estimated at $10,000, making an aggregate of $55,000 for the expedition, exclusive of any compensation to be tendered the hardy adventurers who will consecrate themselves to the work of discovery.

"What is the matter, Julia? you look as sorrowful as a sick lapdog!" "Oh, don't perplex me, that's a dear! my grief is too great for utterance. I've had such an awful vision! I actually dreamed that Rosa Smith had got a new silk dress!"

Important Civil Rights Decision.

An important decision affecting railway companies has just been rendered in the United States District Court at Baltimore by Judge Giles. Harriet Sullivan and seventeen other negroes sued the Baltimore and Ohio Company to recover $2000 damages each, for compelling them to ride in a smoking car while returning on commutation tickets from a point on the Metropolitan branch. The suit was brought under the Supplemental Civil Rights bill, passed by Congress March 1, 1875. Among many witnesses examined was President Garrett, who said that after the Civil Rights bill was passed instructions were given to make no distinction on account of color with passengers on the roads or connections. While the defense in its testimony [illegible] to show, but did not fully establish it, that no distinction had been made in the Galley case, yet counsel for defendant relied on the unconstitutionality of the act of Congress. Judge Giles gave an elaborate opinion, reviewing all similar cases known to the law, and instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, under the following ruling: The act of Congress of March 1, 1875, under which this action is brought, so far as it seeks to inflict penalties for the violation of any or all rights which belong to citizens of a State and not citizens of the United States, as such, was the exercise of a power not authorized by any provision of the constitution of the United States, as the privilege to use for local travel any public conveyance is not a right arising under the constitution of the United States. There can be no recovery of the penalty sued for in this case, and the jury will render their verdict for the defendant. A verdict in accordance with these instructions was rendered.

The President and the Colored People.

A delegation of prominent colored men, says a Washington correspondent, "called upon the President to tender their thanks for the appointment of Fred Douglass as Marshal of the District of Columbia. The Chairman, in a brief address, explained the object of the visit and said the appointment was gratifying to the colored people, because by it he not only recognized their claims but struck a blow at the prejudice of caste, and they wished him success in his policy of reconciliation. The President said in reply that in appointing Mr. Douglass his object was to show to the country that it was his purpose to fully carry out the declaration of his inaugural. The amendments to the constitution must be strictly adhered to and all citizens protected in their rights. He referred to the appointment of colored persons, and said that no discrimination must be made on account of color. Should any public officer having a position to be bestowed make any such discrimination he should consider it sufficient cause for his removal. In conclusion he referred to his policy of reconciliation and expressed his confidence in its success."

Evangelist Burnham was annoyed by a crying baby, while exhorting at Tylerville, Jefferson county, N. Y., recently, and told the mother to remove the child. The people near by told the woman to remain, and the gentle Burnham donned his hat, coat and overshoes, and left the congregation to the stubbornness of their hard hearts.

Songs of Spring.

As one after another of the wild flowers come back to greet us, peeping out of the grass or reaching toward us from shrub or spray, we feel as we do when dear old friends return to us after long absence. The flowers are our friends truly; for everything that has life in it is related to us in some way, and bears some message of love to us from Him without whom neither flowers nor human beings would be alive.

All true poets of nature have felt this, and address the flowers as if they were companions, neighbors or teachers.

Scarcely a more beautiful out-of-door poem of this kind ever has been written than Horace Smith's "Hymn to the Flowers," from which these verses are taken:

> Your voiceless lips, O flowers, are living preachers,
> Each cup a pulpit, and each leaf a book,
> Supplying to my fancy numerous teachers,
> From loneliest nook.
> 'Neath cloistered boughs each floral bell that swingeth
> And tolls its perfume on the passing air,
> Makes Sabbath in the fields, and ever ringeth
> A call to prayer.

The songs of spring are none the less enjoyable for being old—very old indeed.

In Palestine, thousands of years ago, they welcomed her coming just as we do now. A poet-king of that country wrote rejoicingly: "For lo! the winter is past, the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land."

Perhaps the violet has had more poems written about her than any flower except the rose. How can we help saying "her" of this lowly, sweet-breathed child of the meadow and road-side?

The air begins to be as sweet as if the breezes of another world were blown through ours when the violets unfold. This, too, was noticed long ago. Shakspeare speaks of

> The sweet south
> That breathes upon a bank of violets,
> Stealing and giving odor;

And Christina Rossetti writes to-day:

> O wind, where have you been,
> That you blow so sweet?
> Among the violets
> Which blossom at your feet.
> The honeysuckle waits
> For summer and for heat;
> But violets in the chilly spring
> Make the turf so sweet!

Do you know Willis' "April Violets?" Here is part of it. The delicate odor of the flowers seems to steal upon you as you read:

> I have found violets. April hath come on,
> And the cool winds feel softer, and the rain
> Falls in the beaded drops of summer-time.
> You may hear birds at morning, and at eve
> The tame dove lingers till the twilight falls,
> Cooing upon the eaves, and drawing in
> His beautiful, bright neck; and, from the hills,
> A murmur like the hoarseness of the sea
> Tells the release of waters, and the earth
> Sends up a pleasant smell, and the dry leaves
> Are lifted by the grass; and so I know
> That Nature, with her delicate ear, hath heard
> The dropping of the velvet foot of spring.
> Take of my violets! I found them where
> The liquid south stole o'er them, on a bank
> That lean'd to running water. There's to me
> A daintiness about these early flowers,
> That touches me like poetry. They blow
> With such a simple loveliness among
> The common herbs of pasture, and breathe out
> Their lives so unobtrusively, like hearts
> Whose beatings are too gentle for the world.
> I love to go in the capricious days
> Of April and hunt violets, when the rain
> Is in the blue cups trembling, and they nod
> So gracefully to the kisses of the wind.

Barry Cornwall says this lovely thing about the violet:

> She comes, the first, the fairest thing
> That heaven upon the earth doth fling,
> Ere winter's star has set;
> She dwells behind her leafy screen,
> And gives as angels give, unseen—
> The violet.

Faster than the flowers come the birds. As early as the bluebird, honest Robin Redbreast and his wife are here, hopping up and down the garden-walk, turning their heads this way and that, as they consider their prospects for house-building. High in the leafless tree-top—out of a snow-cloud sometimes—you hear the song-sparrow's heavenly carol, so full of hope and gladness! The sweetest and one of the most social of our field minstrels, he has a song for all seasons, and everybody who listens to him is charmed. It is a comfort to know that he is going to stay with us through midsummer, long after most other birds are silent, or have flown away.

The songsters gather in throngs, with their gay or tender ballads, each so different from the rest—wren, swallow, linnet, thrush, oriole—and none of them dearer or merrier than the bobolink, the Robert Burns among bird-poets, whose warble follows the track of the plow, and ripples along the edges of the corn-field. —St. Nicholas for April.

Emperor William's Eightieth Birthday.

The 80th birthday (March 22) of William, Emperor of Germany and King of Prussia, was celebrated at Berlin with great festivities. All nations of Europe were represented by special envoys to convey their congratulations and pay their respects to the octogenarian monarch; and, what with the attendance of the numerous German Princes with their families, Berlin was fairly overrun with royalty and nobility. During the day the city was profusely decorated, and in the evening banquets and illuminations were in order. Emperor William, in spite of his full four-score years, seems to have been able to bear his part in the protracted festivities, receiving in person, from 10 o'clock in the morning until 2 in the afternoon, the immense throng of Princes and dignitaries who paid their respects to the venerable and august ruler of the most powerful nation of Europe. He has occupied the throne for nearly twenty years, having in 1858 been appointed Regent upon the retiring of his brother, Frederick William IV., on account of mental aberration. By the death of the latter without issue, Jan. 2, 1861, William became King of Prussia, and on the 18th of January, 1871, he was proclaimed Emperor of United Germany in the palace of the French Kings at Versailles.

Investigating the Grasshopper.

The President has appointed the following persons as members of the Grasshopper Commission: Prof. S. V. Riley, of St. Louis, known for his labors in economic entomology; Prof. A. S. Packard, Jr., of Salem, Mass., editor of the American Naturalist, who is to be Secretary of the commission; and Prof. Cyrus Thomas, of Carbondale, Ill., State Entomologist. The commission will have its quarters at Washington, with a Western office in St. Louis. Prof. Riley proposes to take the area east of the mountains and south of the fortieth parallel with British America. Prof. Thomas will take the country north of the fortieth parallel to the British American line, excepting Montana. Prof. Packard's field will more particularly cover Montana Territory, Idaho and Utah. The two principal objects of the commission are, first, to ascertain what agency can be brought to bear in facilitating the destruction of the eggs of the insects; second, to discover where the locusts breed. It is known that Montana is one of the fields in which they breed largely, but in all probability the largest breeding ground is in British America. That country being difficult to explore, it is likely that the commission will try to secure the co-operation of the British Government.

How Do Birds Migrate?

Some birds fly only in the day-time; others, such as the fly-catchers, kingfishers, whip-poor-wills and night-hawks, do their traveling at night. Many journey alone or in pairs, although most unite into flocks and travel in company. The migrations of the wild goose are especially interesting. When the time for migration has come, the wild geese assemble and spend some time in a loud and animated discussion of the journey. Then they all rise into the air and arrange themselves in two long lines, meeting like the sides of the letter V. The leader takes up his position at the point where the lines meet, and the birds begin their flight, the point of the V going first, so that the leader is in advance of all the rest of the flock. He is always an old gander; only, as this position is very fatiguing, one leader does not occupy it very long, but, as soon as he becomes tired, falls back to the rear and allows another to take his place. Geese, while upon their migrations, fly very rapidly—according to some estimates, at the rate of 120 miles an hour, or two miles a minute. They generally rest by some pond or river a part of the night, but sometimes they fly all night as well as all day. In the day-time, when the weather is clear, they fly at a great height, often so far up that they are invisible to us, and their loud clamor is the only sign we have that they are passing. At night, or in foggy weather, they fly much nearer the earth, and when the air is very foggy they often become lost, and settle to wait for the mists to clear away.

The distances traveled by different birds vary very much. The robin, red-winged blackbird, and the like, go only far enough to find warmth and food, and one or two warm days in early spring are enough to call them back, after which they often go south again. The red-winged blackbird is found during the whole winter as far north as Virginia, particularly near the sea-coast and in the vicinity of large rice and corn-fields.

Other birds travel much farther in their annual journeys. In the summer the humming-bird is found as far north as Hudson's bay, but it spends its winters in those tropical, or almost tropical, regions where the flowers bloom the year through. As spring advances, this bird travels northward from Mexico by short journeys, keeping pace with the opening flowers, which afford it an unfailing supply of honey and insect food.

Many other birds also make their journey in short flights. This is the case with the robin and the blue-bird, although each is able to fly a great distance without rest, for they are said to visit Bermuda, about 300 miles from the nearest land.

Most birds make their migrations by flight, but a few do not; our coots and rails perform at least part of the journey on foot.

All the birds so far spoken of undertake their journey at certain definite seasons, and their line of march is north and south; but there are some birds which make migrations of a different character. Wild pigeons, for instance, move in whatever direction they are likely to find food, as often east or west as north or south, and these journeys take place at any time when there is a scarcity of food.—St. Nicholas Magazine for April.

Why Do Birds Migrate?

Inability to stand the cold of our winters is generally supposed to be the reason of this migration, and in many cases this is true. A humming-bird or a summer yellow-bird would die very soon if it should be exposed to a winter storm; but we often have very cold and stormy weather after our earlier spring birds have returned, yet they live through it without appearing to suffer very greatly. Birds are very well protected from the cold by their feathers and their warm blood, and the stray robins and blackbirds which occasionally winter with us do not have any difficulty in withstanding the cold. Hence we must look for some other reason for their migration. Most of our migratory land-birds feed upon insects, worms, and small fruit and seeds, and, as these cannot be obtained in the winter, the birds must either move southward when the home supply begins to fail or starve. Lack of food, not cold, is the reason of their migration. Water-birds seem to be able to endure any amount of cold; a duck will swim contentedly for hours, entirely surrounded by ice, and not seem to mind the cold at all. Many of our common water-birds are met with in summer far beyond the Arctic circle, so that inability to stand the climate cannot be the reason why they leave us in the fall for the South. Marsh-birds, like the snipe, the coot, and the plover, and many of our water-birds, such as the wood-duck, feed upon the small animals and plants which they find in shallow water, or in the mud; but as soon as the frost comes all the shallow water is changed to ice, so that this supply of food is cut off, and the birds must go to a warmer country.

We can see, then, that birds migrate from lack of food, and not on account of the cold weather, for those water-birds which, like the gull, are able to catch fish in deep water, stay with us through the whole winter.—St. Nicholas for April.

Railroad Statistics.

Last year only 2,442 miles of railroad were constructed in this country, of which California and Texas built one-third. The season was particularly favorable, both as to material and labor, but the shock of interest received in the panic of 1873 is still felt. There are now about 76,640 miles of railway in the country.

PARIS received 138,084 foreign visitors during 1876, against 139,085 the year previous, and 123,798 in 1874.

WHERE IS GOD?

> "Oh, where is the sea?" the fishes cried,
> As they swam the crystal clearness through,
> "We've heard from of old of the ocean's tide,
> And we long to look on the waters blue.
> The wise ones speak of the infinite sea;
> Oh, who can tell us if such there be?"
> The lark flew up in the morning bright,
> And sung and balanced on sunny wings;
> And this was its song: "I see the light,
> I look o'er a world of beautiful things;
> But flying and singing everywhere,
> In vain I have searched to find the air."

—Scribner for April.

THEY have had a singular electoral tribunal in a village of Awa, Japan. The neighborhood was harassed by a midnight robber, whom nobody could detect. The head of the hamlet summoned the entire male population under his charge, and directed every man to write the name of the person whom he suspected and deposit the ticket in a box. Fifteen ballots bore the name of Abe Tanihei, the rest being blanks. The man whom everybody distrusted was so overcome with astonishment that he made full confession and went to prison.

SPRING SONG.

> From the cold stillness of the night,
> Where icy caverns, fields of snow,
> And shadowy visions, wan and white,
> Make life a dull and ghostly glow;
> A song that shames this song of mine,
> More light than any bird that flies,
> Flows gently past the leafless pine,
> Then faintly flutters, weeps and dies.
> But soon to flowering life new-born,
> It thrills the snow-bound dreams of death;
> And all the golden light of morn
> Throbs with a mild, exultant breath.
> Sweet, magic music of the spring,
> Awakening of diviner day—
> The sunlit souls of angels wing
> To blooming earth their rosy way.

A Big Estate.

James Irvine is the fortunate owner of the San Joaquin and Lomas de Santiago ranches in Los Angeles county, containing 95,000 acres, and of 12,000 acres in the Santa Ana ranch adjoining. In other words, he owns 107,000 acres of as fertile soil as is to be found in Southern California, comprising mountains, valleys, coast-line, and mesa lands. To give a better idea of this estate, we may say that it is twenty-two miles long by nine miles wide. It is all within Los Angeles county, and, being the fairly-earned property of a pioneer settler, he is entitled to its full enjoyment.—San Francisco Post.

AUBURN, INDIANA, APR. 4, 1877

The Governor has not yet appointed the State House Commissioners. Beyond tearing down the rickety old shanty now standing in the square, nothing can be done for a year to come.—Col. City Post.

It is at last settled that the next House is Democratic by at least fifteen majority, and it may be made thirty by the clerk. Two years hence the Senate will be Democratic, and then his Fraudulency will be in a nice box.

The editor of the New York Sun is acting as the treasurer of the Bradley fund, the object of which is to present Jos. Bradley, the fifth Judge, who refused to investigate fraud, on the infamous Commission with thirty pieces of silver as a token of their esteem of a corrupt Judge who stole a president. The move is entirely proper.

The New York Sun very truthfully remarks that "if the American people had not been cheated out of the President they elected last November, the long-hoped-for revival of business would ere this have been in full activity. The counting in of a fraudulent President is the efficient cause of the intensified depression that now prevails in almost every branch of commercial affairs."

The two mulatto confederates on the Board, Casenace and Keaner, will doubtless be provided for in good time, as representatives of their race. Complaint is made that Hayes does not more quickly and at once take care of the faithful who counted him into the White House. But he can point with pride to Sherman, Evarts, Matthews, and McLin as examples of his fidelity. All he asks is time to "make everything right."

Frederick Douglass, who has been a chronic officeholder, begins his new career as Marshal of the District of Columbia by introducing nepotism at the outset. His place is estimated to be worth $8,000 or $10,000 a year, and yet one of his first acts is to "appoint his son Lewis H. Douglass, one of his deputies," at $3,000 a year, while another son is a clerk in the Third Auditor's office, and still another is in the public service somewhere else. Of course they are "representatives of their race."

Hayes is like a fish out of water. He has made all sorts of promises to the South and to his own Northern friends, and how to please them all puzzles His Fraudulency very much. He proposes to send a commission to settle the Louisiana difficulty and he has invited Chamberlain and Hampton to meet him in Washington to fix up things for South Carolina. With no positive fixed policy the man who occupies a stolen office finds his crown full of thorns to torture him, as it should. The party of theft is making poor headway.

An exchange says: It seems to us that our legislature done a very foolish thing in passing a law compelling all theaters, opera houses under a penality of one thousand dollars to hang the doors so as to swing outward. It is well enough to have such a law applicable to large public houses as theatres,, opera houses and churches which may be packed with thousands of persons, but when the law requires every little country school house and village church, which can be emptied in two or three minutes, to change their doors or pay a penalty of $1,000, the thing is bording upon the "ridiculous." There is a wrong impression about the new law. All public rooms on the first floor are exempt from any change in the doors, so that country school houses and churches remain the same.

A Bargain which Made Hayes President.

It is now established by unquestioned evidence that the final completion of the electoral count and the declaration by Congress of the result determined by the Electoral Commission, was accomplished through a bargain made between Charles Foster and Stanley Matthews of Ohio, as representatives of Mr. Hayes, and a number of Southern Democrats. The conditions of this bargain were an agreement on the part of the Democrats that there should be no filibustering in the House of Representatives, such as was then threatened, to prevent the conclusion of the electoral count; and that the declaration that Hayes was elected should not be interfered with. The matter was in the power of the Democrats of the House, and if these Southern men had been willing to allow such filibustering, Hayes could not have been declared elected, and could not have gained possession of the Government; and thus the whole Republican conspiracy would have come to naught, with all that had been done in South Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, and Washington. The managers of Hayes had no choice but to agree to the demands of those who had the power to keep him out of the White House; and what they agreed to on their part was simply that, as soon as Hayes was installed, the troops of the United States should be withdrawn from South Carolina and Louisiana, and that the Democratic Governments of those States should be allowed to establish themselves without further interference of Federal power.

Paying the Returning Boards.

The present Administration must not be charged with ingratitude.

Four votes were stolen from Tilden in Florida, and turned over to Hayes by the Returning Board of that State. We have already reported the fact that the chief of these rascals, Samuel B. McLin, has been appointed Associate Justice in New Mexico, as a recognition of his services. As this place is under the department of which Gen. Devens is the head, who was a Judge himself, of good repute, and ought to know the qualifications for such a trust, it becomes him to explain whether he recommended this appointment, or only obeyed the Fraudulent President's order in making it.

But however that may be, the Hon. Madison Wells of Louisiana will be cheered by such a Beautiful illustration of civil service reform. Thus far, he has not received his reward, owing to the unsettled condition of the State of his residence: but he still expresses the utmost confidence in Hayes, who entertained him handsomely at the White House, and spoke admiringly of his fortitude under difficulties. Tom Anderson, his patriotic colleague of the Returning Board, is an applicant for the Collectorship of New Orleans, and is backed for it by the Fraudulent Secretary of the Treasury, who was an eye witness of his achievements in transferring Louisiana from Tilden to Hayes.

It is again announced that proceedings in quo warranto will be promptly instituted to compel Mr. Hayes to show by what authority he is exercising the office of President. The papers for this purpose are in Washington, in the hand of Mr. Merrick, the brilliant Washington attorney, late of counsel for Mr. Tilden before the Electoral Commission. Mr. Tilden will have two Judges of the Court, and they are only nine. Mr. Tilden should therefore feel encouraged. He will be like the man who found a horse-shoe, and exultingly said that he only needed to find three more shoes and a horse, when he could ride.

Corunna Items.

From a glance over the freigt books of the Lake Shore R. R. we learn that the amount of grain receipts for the next monthly report, which will be closed and sent in to headquarters on the 15th of the present month, fell a little short of last month. From the 15th of March up to the 1st of April there had been receipted at Corunna station 266,490 lbs. of wheat and 50,000 lbs of oats. As the old crop of wheat is being rapidly moved, there will be a great deal of falling off in receipts until the new crop comes in. The following prices are being paid for grain and other produce the present week: Amber N. one $1.44; No. two, do. $1.30; white No. one $1.46; No. two, do. $1.33. Oats dull at 36c, white oats 38c. Corn in demand at 45c. Clover seed at $8,15; potatoes $1,00; hogs, liveweight 4 @ 5c, dressed 5 @ 6c hides green 5c.

The storm of last Sunday created considerable damage in this section. It assumed the form of a typhoon, or hurricane, passing about 2½ miles north of this place, and seemed to cover a space of at least three-fourths of a mile in width. In its course barns and other out-houses of an unsubstantial fixture were unroofed and forests were uprooted and laid waste in a miscellaneous manner.

"My policy" as laid down by. His fraudulency does not meet with a cordial approval by the heretofore ardent admirers of that distinguished fraud of the White House; here and hereabouts. That kind of rads. do not use profane language in relieving themselves of the slumbering volcano within, but then they ejaculate "by doing" with reference.

A desciple of the Red Ribbon pursuasion held forth at this place on Saturday night last on the subject of temperance.

He looked forlorn and weary, and was dressed after the fashion of the ancient mariner. Booked as a street lecturer, he came among us last week and made the grand sounds. Having realized the sum of $2.50 in currency of the realm, he quietly folded up his tent and took up his march toward the rising sun.

Something new and practical. The Almosphine Pressure Clothes Washer. Messrs Hensley & Conrad, of Elkhart, Indiana, has purchased of the patentee, H. D. Crooker, of Essex Junction, Vermont, the sole right of DeKalb county for the above named clothes washer, and a man canvassing for the sale of the same. This patent washer is the best one in use, and will perform all that is claimed for it, and sells for the low sum of $5, family right included. Mr. Hensley is now operating in this place and vicinity, and a sample of the machine may be seen at the Union Hall.

Gust J. Beck, the genial manager of the Waterloo City Bakery and Confectionery, was in town the other day. Gust is the same thing "all the year 'round," and our wish is that he may live long and prosper.

FRUIT HOUSE PRICES.

No dull times with us---Our trade continually on he increase.

No secret about it, simply purchasing our goods in large quantities of first hands and selling direct to our customers at a small profit, thereby saving them the profits of the middle men which adds 15 to 20 per cent.; even forty per cent on some goods. This saving we are bound to give to our customers.

Take tea for instance: The advance on that article from the time it arrives in New and is sold to the speculator, and from him to the jobber, and from the jobber to the wholesale grocer, and from the wholesale grocer to the retail dealer, is at least 30 per cent. As each of these dealers has to make his 5 to 10 per cent. on the sale, and then the retailer, he must have his profit, and by the time it reaches the consumer there is at least 50 per cent added to it. We cut all these off by ordering direct from the importer and selling direct to the consumer. When we first commenced our trade was two chests a month and now it is as many chests a day. So with all other goods, Sugars Coffees, Tobaccoes, Fish, Spice or anything we deal in, we purchase at the first hands and resell direct to the consumer and save the profits of the middle dealers.

Something is going to be done. A startling report has reached us that Hayes has finally concluded to think about action in the South Carolina case. So far this is all his Fraudulency has done.

Look out for a new price list next week of the Fort Wayne Fruit House. Great bargains in raisins, canned Peaches and meats. No dull times with Captain White.

We are glad to know that the Mayer House at Fort Wayne, has much improved under the management of Dr. Rhoads, that it has become the popular hotel in that city. It deserves the patronage it has so generally received.

Young Green, of Waterloo, tweaked George Chamber's nose in Voss' saloon last Saturday night. Blood flowed freely.—[Albion New Era.

Tweaked is a good word. As long as DeKalb county does the tweaking we don't care.

The Defiance Democrat touches one fact when it says: "Rebels down south can get plenty of offices under Hayes and Key, but a one-armed soldier in Toledo cannot obtain an office he deserves. How are you bloody shirt!

Hon. R. W. Lockhart is deligated to state that his mother-in-law is very old. Ah, Bob, there will be many to envy you. An active middle aged mother-in-law may be a luxury, but there is an advantage in age.

We see that Johny Godown is a candidate for city clerk again, after holding two terms in Fort Wayne. We hope this is not to go down with the people again No third time. He will soon believe he has a life lease on the office.

We should have announced last week the death of the wife of our clever deputy Treasurer, S. M. Mottinger, Esq. The grim visitor came suddenly and without warning, leaving him with three children. The deceased was about thirty years of age.

The donation party for the benefit of Mr. Welch, at the M. E. church last Monday evening was a pleasant affair, and quite a little fund was the result. Dr. Ford presented the young folks' donation in a neat little speech which was happily responded to by Mr. Welch

A fair lady correspondent asks us whether stripped stockings are now in fashion. As our fashion editor is out of town, it will be impossible for us to decide this question. It is a subject of some importance no doubt, and we will look it up and see.

Mr. A. P. Foltz, who removed to Toledo a few months ago from this place, was in town Monday, making arrangements to move back again. He thought of bettering his condition by going to some other point but finally comes back satisfied that Auburn is as good as any.

The Fort Wayne Gazette is annoying itself about Clerk Adams and the roll of the next House, fearful lest he should use his power for his party. Mr. Adams will do the right thing, and we are satisfied his ruling will give much more satisfaction than the decision of the electoral commission which was endorsed by the Gazette.

Under a new law the board of commissioners of each county are granted the privilege of appointing two students from the county to Purdue University, who are to be supported during the time they are at the institution. Vacancies that may occur are to be filled by the board.

The Medical Association of Northeastern Indiana, at its recent session passed the following resolution.

RESOLVED. That the members of this association learn with regret of the severe illness of Dr. Erickson, president of this society, and that we tender him and his family our sympathy in their affliction and best wishes for his speedy recovery.

A terrible accident happened at Cedarville, this county, on Saturday afternoon. A team of horses belonging to Timbrook & Grush was standing near the river, when they suddenly took fright, dashed down the embankment and plunged into the stream. They swam to a point near the mill, when, becoming exhausted, they sank and were seen no more until their dead bodies were taken out The team was valued at $300.—Fort Wayne News.

The Stuben Republican gave the following piece of acting last week: "I never can enjoy poetry when I'm cookin, said an old lady below Pleasant Lake the other day; "but when I step out to feed the hogs, and h'its myself on the fence and throw my soul into a few lines of 'Captain Jinks,' it does seem as if this airth was made to live on, after all."

We were in Garrett on Tuesday, and noticed many improvements going on. It has several nicely graded streets, and in this particular Auburn might imitate it to advantage. There will doubtless be more activity in the shops this year than last. We found Squire Bacon located in a handsome office, and very busy. We are obliged to Theo. [illegible] the popular Sargent House for favors.

We are glad to notice that our enterprising tonsorial artist, S. Pommert, has enlarged his sphere of usefulness by enlarging his facilities and has taken the room next door to the post office, where he has fitted up rooms in the very best style. He will run three chairs, our old friend Wm. Edgington, presiding over one of them. This is a good move as it gives us a first class barber shop.

The M. E. Conference of North Eastern Indian, is in session at Bluffton this week. The bishop will turn the crank of the machine, and out will pop a minister for this point as well as other ministers for other points, and its like a lottery, sometimes a blank is drawn. But we hope we'll get a rattler, one that can shake 'em up, and hold an audience in "breathless silence."

There is a new breed of ducks very higly spoken of and of great utility in this country. Mr. Wm. Wheisel can give you full particulars. They are said to be efficacious on lots covered with water as their consumption of aqua, soon fleaves the lot dry. Garrett will make a heavy demand for them and we would advise agents to make applications to Dr. Parker at once.

The Plymouth Republican says: "Five members of the Indiana legislature have died since the election. The state would have been better off if it had been fifty instead of five." It seems that these five were republicans, and how the Republican can bring itself down to as fair a statement as that, puzzles us. Most of these deaths were caused by the terrible condition of the present State House. And yet there are those who glory in having voted against a new one.

The fee and salary bill has been amended in the sections relating to circuit, superior, criminal and justices' courts. The new law provides that every witness attending the three courts first named, in his own county, shall be allowed $1.20 per day; from another county, $1,25 per day and five cents mileage for each mile traveled in going and returning from court. Witness fees before a justice of the peace shall be one dollar per day and five cents mileage each way, providing that the party subpœnaing more than three witnessses to testify in a civil case to the same fact, shall pay the costs of all over three.

Lecture Association.

A few of our citizen met last Friday evening at Dr. Spooner's office, and orgaized the DeKalb county Lecture Association. Mr. James Rose was elected President, Prof. Seiler, Vice President, T. C. Mays Sec'y, J. J. Vanauken Treas., and Dr. Spooner, Al. Robbins and W. L. Penfield a board of managers The Secretary is in correspondence with Theodore Tilton, Col. Bob. Ingersol, Dr. Swing, Mark Twain and others, with a view to have them deliver a lecture before the Association in a short time.

Passing Ryan's store the other day we heard a noise as if some one was making a speech. In company with a friend we stepped in and found quite a number present, and the speaker well advanced in his argument. At first we thought it was Weamer, until we saw his cane and then we knew it wasn't our neighbor. It proved to be Prof. Hough, the great tramp lecturer, who delivers a series of lectures every ten minutes at five cents a head. He picked up enough nickels to improve his appearance quite materially.

The Press of last week says: "No one is likely to accuse us of any partiality to the Hon. Freeman Kelley, at least so far as the political aspirations of that gentleman are concerned; but a feeling of local pride compels us to protest against the assertion of the Garrett News, (in a second-handed way to be sure,) that Dr. Davenport, of Warsaw could have defeated Mr. Baker in 1874. He could not have come within 500 votes of Freeman's figure." The Press is correct, as anyone knowing the condition of things at the time will admit. None but the most visionary can come to any other conclusion.

Fort Wayne is having a skirmish preparatory to a fight as to who is to be the next mayor. It seems to us that it requires no special qualification to determine that question. We see, in connection with those who are mentioned as candidates, the name of one who would be a credit and an honor to the position and to the city, and that is our accomplished friend, E. L. Chittenden, Esq. His practical knowledge of the city's affairs for years, his excellent record while in official position in the past, and his great popularity as an agreeable, polite and affable gentleman, should commend him to all classes. We shall be disappointed as usual, in Fort Wayne, if he is not nominated.

The pleasant and agreeable gentemen Messrs Certia & Rankert, preprietors of the Bloomingdale brewery at Fort Wayne, desire us to state that they are now supplying the trade with a first class article of Bock and lager beer etc. and are largely increasing their trade by the splendid article they are producing. Though beer is not our beverage, yet we learn from judges that this brewery stands ahead of all others now in the foamy frothy beverage. If our people would drink less strong drinks and come down to beer, it would be an advance in the direction of temperance, and there would be less drunkenness in our midst. Try this brewery with an order, and test the merits of the manufacture.

Hon John H. Baker went three days and three nights without sleep or rest; so earnest was he to serve his constituent. We wonder if he took any stimulents.—[Garrett News.

It gives us pleasure to answer the above question. It is a personal one and we can do so with great propriety, as it will have no political bearing. Mr. Baker was a model in his social relations while in Washington. We had facilities of knowing as to his deportment, and can testify that it will bear the most rigid scrutiny. He never indulged in stimulents, attended church regularly and avoided evil associates. Had he been of our political persuasion we could not have more admiration for the exemplary course he pursued, and as a republican made an excellent member. We feel we are making no concessions in saying this of our Representative. We are honest and fair, and had that electoral commission been the same, Mr Hayes would not now be worried over his southern peace policy.

We are glad to know that the Courier looks for better times, "in spite of radical extravagance."—[Press.

Yes, we have been looking for better times, in spite of the great extravagance which has had its influence in prostrating the business of the country. Hayes starts out by a show of civil service reform. What need of any reform—why put Schurz, the great exponent of this reform, at the head of a department, prostituted by Zach Chandler, if there has been no extravagance, no stealing going on? The democratic party has charged this against the last administration and Hayes admits the charge as being correct, by making a show to bring about this reform. But business has as yet taken no leap forward as was fondly anticipated at the inauguration of Hayes. There has been no improvement felt here, and general depression still reigns supreme. We did feel as though the times should grow better immediately, but it has not come In the meantime Hayes is vacilating between two influences, and relief has been postponed. His inaugural is a promise guaranting local self-government, and yet four weeks have passed without any show of his intention to carry his pledge. Having been placed in position by a commission, he proposes to decide his policy by the same means.

The East Bridge again Destroyed.

For the second time in two years, the bridge over Cedar Creek, east of Auburn has again become impassible through the rise in that stream. The bridge has been built but a short time, and has never answered the purpose in any particular. There should be a substantial bridge erected with a long span, double width, and high enough to be above high water mark. This bridge point has been tampered with long enough, and we hope the commissioners will promptly comply with a great demand, to put in a good substantial bridge and avoid this rebuilding and repairing almost every season. Good bridges are built in other parts of the county, and very properly too, and now Auburn asks for one, which in the end will prove much cheaper than the miserable structure that now afflicts us.

It seems that under a loosely drawn act empowering county officers to copy all records, defaced or destroyed, they may copy everything of record in their offices from the time of the flood until the present day, and charge for it by the hundred words. The law reducing rates of taxation on unplatted ground within city or township limit, will, in the opinion of the state officers, reduce the taxation of the state $15,000.

Other beauties of hasty legislation are daily being revealed. Tame duck are not allowed to be killed at certain seasons of the year, and boys and girls eighteen and sixteen years of age respectively, are permitted to marry. We are glad to know that tame ducks are to have a rest. If there is anything more than another, that can bring tears to the eyes, it is the killing of tame ducks. And how kind of the legislature to let boys and girls commence their misery at 18 and 16. Our handsome lady friend in Jackson-tp., will not have to wait so long, now that the law has been changed.

The game law, as passed by the last session of the legislature, contains the following provisions:

Section 1. No deer to be trapped or killed between January 1st and October 1st of each year; fine $10.

Sec. 2. Quail shall not be netted or trapped at any time, and quails and pheasants not to be shot, trapped or destroyed from January 1st to November 1st of each year; fine $1 for each bird.

Sec. 3. Not to shoot or trap prairie chickens from the 1st of February to the 1st of October each year, nor to net them at any time; fine $2; and for shooting or hunting with dogs on enclosed lands without consent of owner or occupant; fine $50.

Sec. 4. Not to kill, injure or pursue with intent to injure, any turtle dove, meadow-lark, wren, sparrow, red bird, pewee, martin, thrush, swallow, oriole, yellow-hammer, cat bird or wantonly destroy or disturb their nests or eggs, or young birds thus protected; fine not less than $1 nor more than $10.

Sec. 5. Protects wood cock from the 1st of January to the 1st of July, and ducks from the 15th of April to the 1st of September each year.

Sec. 6. Imposes a fine of $2 each on the agent of any express company for carrying any of the foregoing contra band birds or game.

In the Sweet By-and-By.

Cannot but be the happy thought as the fortunate recipient of the "Rocky Mountain Tourist" scans its wonderfully attractive pages and peruses its fascinating descriptions. Most beautifully embellished with new and highly artistic engravings, its letter press a model of typographical richness, and the arrangement throughout simply superb, the Rocky Mountain Tourist is worthy of comparison with "Picturesque America or The Aldine" It is written in gossipy, graphic style, covering details of the tour through the garden of the Southwest (the Arkansas Valley, Southern Kansas), to the very heart of the Alps of America—the Rocky Mountains, Jaunts are made to all the famous resorts of Colorado, the remarkable ruins, the springs, the mines, and, in short, to every point of interest to tourists, agriculturists, capitalists, miner, and invalid. With the Tourists, the San Juan Guide keeps fitting company, and the two publications are mailed free to all writing for one or both to T. J. ANDERSON, Topeka, Kansas.

An enthusiast in this movement struck Auburn last Tuesday night and opened out in a lecture to a good audience. His pronunciation, his grammar and his style of delivery was poor, his gush and enthusiasm very great. His theory is that red ribbon is going to save drunkards when other things fail. We hope so, and we have two or three in our mind's eye, whom we hope he will gobble up before he leaves. He claims great efficacy for this red piece of fancy goods, and a dissipated man will not give way to his passions when wearing it. With the ribbon in your button-hole, people know where you stand. It is a silent monitor, like a beacon light, showing you the rocks of a drunkard's doom. Its a lowering of colors, from the nose to the button-hole. We agree with Bro. W. Griswold, that when we have to wear a ribbon to show where we stand in society, a separation, as it were, of the sheep and the goats, we will have lost our faith in human progress. For fifty years we have fought with unrelenting energy, off an on, this dreaded foe, signed every pledge, and joined every organization devised by the genius of man, and now they ask Bro. Griswold and us, to put on a red ribbon! Never! We protest that we have established our reputation; that we are known far and wide as pronounced temperance men, then why a badge? Bro Jim may wear a ribbon to advantage, he has not stood the storm so long, but as for us "let the galded jade wince, our withers are unwrung."

A little temperance will not hurt Auburn just now, even if but temporary. There are six saloons here and that is just twice as many as we ought to support. We understand there will be a red ribbon organization to-night, Those who are interested in this matter should stand by it. As for us, we are with Bro. Griswold, and we stand by him as long as he stands by us.

The Ladies social of the Presbyterian church will be entertained at the residence of Mrs. F. Picker on Friday afternoon and evening of this week. A cordial invitation is extended to all, and it is hoped there will be a full attendance. Owing to heavy taxation on members entertaining the society, a vote was taken on reorganizing to alter bylaws requiring mite to be paid by members whether present or not, and substitute a fifteen cent mite for the afternoon, Children served with plate 10 cents. Evening social 10 cents. By order of society.

We visited our high school yesterday, and it being the first time we were ever in the building, we felt proud of the handsome edifice; which has been secured to us through the excellent management of our school board. The different grades are progressing finely under an efficient corps of teachers, and we are now enjoying first-class educational facilities. We have only time to say this much, but intend to give a more extended notice in the future.

THE NEWS CONDENSED.

SOUTH CAROLINA AFFAIRS.

At the Cabinet session held on the 23d of March, to devise some mode for the adjustment of the political troubles in South Carolina, it was decided to invite the rival claimants to the Governorship to visit Washington and have a conference with the President. Accordingly the following letter was addressed to Messrs. Chamberlain and Hampton. It was signed by W. K. Rogers, Private Secretary to the President:

SIR: I am instructed by the President to bring to your attention his purpose to take into immediate consideration the position of affairs in South Carolina, with a view of determining the course which, in the order of the constitution and laws of the United States, it may be his duty to take in reference to the situation in that State, as he finds it upon succeeding to the Presidency. It would give the President great pleasure to confer with you in person, if you shall find it convenient to visit Washington, and shall concur with him in thinking such a conference the readiest and best mode of placing your views as to the political situation in your State before him. He would greatly prefer this direct communication of opinion and information to any other method of ascertaining your views upon the present condition and the immediate prospect of public interests in South Carolina. If reasons of weight with you should discourage this course, the President will be glad to receive any communication from you, in writing, or through any delegate possessing your confidence, that will convey to him your views of the impediments to a peaceful and orderly organization of a single and undisputed State Government in South Carolina, and of the best methods of removing them. It is the earnest desire of the President to be able to put an end, as speedily as possible, to all appearance of the intervention of the military of the United States in the political derangements which affect the Government and afflict the people of South Carolina. In this desire the President cannot doubt that he truly represents the patriotic feeling of the great body of the people of the United States. It is impossible that a protracted disorder in the domestic Government of any State can, or should, ever fail to be a matter of the liveliest interest and solicitude to the people of the whole country. In the furtherance of a prompt and safe execution of this general purpose, he invites a full communication of your opinions on the whole subject, in such one of the proposed forms as may seem to you most useful.

THE LOUISIANA ARBITRATORS.

The commission appointed by President Hayes to visit Louisiana for the purpose of bringing about a compromise between the rival State Governments is constituted as follows: Gen. John M. Harlan, of Kentucky, Chairman; Gen. Joseph R. Hawley, of Connecticut; Judge Charles B. Lawrence, of Illinois; Wayne McVeagh, of Pennsylvania; and ex-Gov. J. C. Brown, of Tennessee. The first four are Republicans, while ex-Gov. Brown, of Tennessee, is a Conservative Democrat. The commission will at once set about its work. It is said they will endeavor to induce both parties to agree to reorganize the Legislature by permitting members of both branches whose seats are uncontested, and whose election is conceded by both parties, to pass upon the contested cases, and that the Legislature thus constituted shall, under the constitution and laws of Louisiana, canvass the votes for Governor. If the two parties decline to so reorganize the Legislature the President is fully determined to thereupon immediately withdraw the troops from the support of the Packard Government, and to notify both factions that, having failed to accept the adjustment proposed by the administration, the Federal troops cannot be used to sustain any State government, and that the two pretended Governors must settle their own affairs in their own way.

THE FOSTER-MATTHEWS PLEDGES.

We print below the full text of the letter of Judge Matthews and Congressman Foster, of Ohio, to Senator Gordon, of Georgia, and Congressman Brown, of Kentucky, touching which a good deal has been lately said. The letter was given to the public by Mr. Brown at the request of Messrs. Matthews and Foster:

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 27, 1877.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to the conversation had with you yesterday, in which Gov. Hayes' policy as to the status of certain Southern States was discussed, we desire to say we can assure you in the strongest possible manner of our great desire to have him adopt such a policy as will give to the people of the States of South Carolina and Louisiana the right to control their own affairs in their own way, subject only to the constitution of the United States and the laws, made in pursuance thereof, and to say further, that, from an acquaintance with and knowledge of Gov. Hayes and his views, we have the most complete confidence that such will be the policy of the administration.

Respectfully, STANLEY MATTHEWS,
CHARLES FOSTER.

To Hon. John B. Gordon and John Young Brown.

THE EAST.

ANOTHER New England mill dam has given way, destroying a vast amount of property and sweeping away everything of human construction for miles down a populous valley. The break occurred at the Staffordsville reservoir, near the northern border of Connecticut, where the headwaters of the Willimantic were gathered for the use of the mills below. Fortunately, the people along the water course below discovered their danger in time to escape, and only one life was lost. About $750,000 worth of property was destroyed.

THE WEST.

THE Chicago Tribune publishes a collection of brief communications from farmers in Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa and Minnesota, giving information relative to the grasshopper outlook for 1877. All agree that the severe weather of March has not destroyed the eggs to any appreciable extent, and that with the advent of warmer weather the hatching process will go forward as in former years. In many localities organized action will be taken, and there seems to have been a general and uniform adoption of the policy of leaving the dried grass of the prairies to be burned over in the spring instead of the fall, and by this means destroy vast quantities of the insects before they have reached an able-bodied stage of growth.... The persons engaged in the late massacre of Chinese, at Chico, Cal., have been arrested.

AN attempt was recently made near Deadwood, Dakota, to rob the Cheyenne and Black Hills stage. Five masked men intercepted the coach, shot and killed the driver and seriously wounded one of the passengers. The horses ran away and did not stop till they reached Deadwood, thus depriving the highwaymen of their anticipated booty.... W. Maxwell and his son, aged 16, stock men, formerly of Stuart, Iowa, and located in Colfax county, New Mexico, were recently murdered by a negro, who has since been captured at Trinidad, Col. Robbery was the probable cause, as Maxwell was supposed to have money with him.

A SHOOTING affray recently occurred in Topeka, Kan., between J. Clark Swayze, editor of of the Topeka Blade, and John W. Wilson, formerly of the Topeka Times, in which Mr. Swayze was killed.

A SPECIAL dispatch from Tucson, Arizona, to the New York Herald says the following is a correct copy of the original order given concerning the Mountain Meadows massacre. The order, with the three affidavits authenticating it, was found among the papers of the late Chief Justice John Titus, of Arizona, and formerly Chief Justice of Utah:

SPECIAL ORDER.

SALT LAKE CITY, April 19, 1858.

The officer in command of the escort is hereby ordered to see that every man is well prepared with ammunition and to have it ready at the time you are [illegible] 150 miles from the settlement. President Young advises that they should all be [illegible] to prevent them returning to Bridger to join our enemies. [illegible] precaution should be taken, and [illegible]. Secrecy is required. By order of Gen. Daniel H. Wells.

JAMES FERGUSON,
Assistant Adjutant General.

A NEW narrow-gauge railroad is proposed, running across Michigan from South Haven toward Toledo, Ohio.... The rush of emigration to the Black Hills is on the increase....

HERMAN McQUAIG recently shot and killed James H. Jackson, aged 60, and his son aged 21, at a ranche on Horse creek, thirty miles north of Cheyenne. The cause of the shooting was a quarrel about a woman, a cousin of McQuaig.

WASHINGTON.

THE Commissioner of the General Land Office has issued orders providing for the vigorous prosecution of the work of detecting and bringing to punishment depredators on public timber-lands, especially in Minnesota, where violations of the law are most numerous.... The Solicitor of the Treasury, after an investigation of the charges against Assistant Secretary Conant, exonerates that official.

THE Secretary of the Treasury has issued another call for the redemption of 5-20 bonds of 1865, May and November. The call is for $10,000,000, of which $9,500,000 are coupon and $500,000 registered bonds. The principal and interest will be paid at the treasury on and after the 27th day of June next, and interest will cease on that day. The following is a description of the bonds: Coupon bonds—$500, from No. 42,301 to No. 46,000, both inclusive; $1,000, from No. 121,021 to No. 130,000, both inclusive. Registered bonds—$500, from No. 7,494 to No. 7,500, both inclusive.

THE regulations allowing the United States Treasurer to furnish silver coin on certificates of deposit of the Assistant Treasurer and national bank depositories has been modified to permit the shipments of silver directly to the parties making the deposit. The expense of the transportation is paid by the department to points in the United States reached through established express lines by continuous railway or steamboat communication. The deposits are to be in sums of not less than $1,000 or its multiple, and not exceeding $10,000.... Wade Hampton and D. H. Chamberlain arrived at Washington last week, in response to the invitation of the President, for the purpose of having a conference with the administration in regard to the political complications in South Carolina.

RICHARD C. MCCORMICK, late delegate in Congress from Arizona, has been appointed Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in place of Conant, who has been sent to Europe to assume charge of the Syndicate Bureau.... The following Indian Agents have been appointed: James Lawrence, of Dakota, for the Spotted Tail Agency, Nebraska; James J. Patten, of Wyoming, for the Shoshone Agency, Wyoming.

THE SOUTH.

A LADY named Armstrong and her son were burned to death at Little Rock, Ark., a few days ago. Coal oil.... Nicholls and Packard, the rival claimants to the Governorship of Louisiana, have again issued proclamations, each asserting that he is at the head of a fully-organized Government, and that his rival is a pretender, a fraud, etc.

INFORMATION from New Orleans is to the effect that "Packard continues to arm his militia, principally colored, but the adherents of Nicholls say that they have no apprehension of danger, as their armed friends are far more numerous and effective than Packard's, while an additional force from the adjoining States can be procured if necessary."

A NEW ORLEANS dispatch says P. B. S. Pinchback, the well-known colored politician, has been appointed by Gov. Nicholls, and confirmed by the Senate, a member of the State Board of Education. A. H. Corbin (colored), formerly Secretary of the City School Board, was appointed by Gov. Nicholls Tax Collector of the Sixth District of New Orleans. Several other colored men have been appointed to lucrative offices by Gov. Nicholls.

POLITICAL.

THE following Associated Press dispatch from Washington was apparently inspired by the President, and explains itself: "Concerning the alleged assurance of the President to Southern gentlemen, involving the withdrawal of the troops from the capitals of Louisiana and South Carolina, there is authority for stating that the President has given no assurance of immediate action on the subject. In all cases he has said that the gravity of these questions required caution and deliberation, and hence his recent letters to Govs. Chamberlain and Hampton, inviting them to Washington. It is further stated in official quarters that previous to the President's inauguration he meditated sending a commission to Louisiana. Several of the prominent Southern men, who had been referred to as parties to various alleged 'agreements' on this subject, say they are as well satisfied now as at any previous time that in the end no Southern State Government will be sustained by Federal troops. They consider that nothing has been done by the President since he indorsed the sentiments of Representative Foster's speech, or since he made them more emphatically his own in his inaugural address, which violates or indicates any intended violation of the policy thus announced, and, therefore, even if the assurances given by Matthews and Foster had been made by the President himself (which was not the case) there is no ground for asserting that they will not be fulfilled."

WADE HAMPTON, the dispatches from Washington report, has had a lengthy interview with the President in regard to South Carolina affairs. The conversation, we are told, was of a free and general character, and related primarily to the question as to the probable condition of the State in case the troops should be withdrawn, there being no discussion of Chamberlain's right or title to the Governorship. Hampton claimed that there was an imperative necessity for speedy action, as the planting interests of South Carolina are in absolute danger of destruction by reason of the present unsettled state of affairs, the labor system being now in process of disintegration. Business, he said, was paralyzed and credit almost entirely destroyed throughout the State in consequence of its present unsettled condition. Hampton pledged the President that in case the troops were called off there should be no mob violence, and that only legal processes would be resorted to to establish the supremacy of his Government. He said he possessed both the purpose and the power to protect all persons and classes alike in their legal and constitutional rights. The President, in reply, stated substantially that it was his purpose to carry out in good faith the promises of his inaugural address, as he was deeply anxious to bring peace and quiet to the distracted portions of the country, and he was satisfied this result would be attained in a very short time. A committee appointed by the Charleston Chamber of Commerce, which had accompanied Hampton to Washington, also called upon the President, and read an address setting forth the condition of affairs in South Carolina, and pleading for the recognition of Hampton.

The competition between the theatrical managers of Chicago is unusually brisk just now, and, as a result, the amusement bills are more than ordinarily attractive. As usual, McVicker's is ahead, large audiences appearing nightly to witness the finished acting of Mr. Dion Boucicault, the celebrated Irish-English actor, as Conn, the Shaughraun, in the play of that name—said to be the most interesting and amusing Irish drama ever written.

THE thirty-fourth English university boat-race was rowed on the 24th of March, and the course was the usual one on the Thames, from Putney to Mortlake; distance four miles and two furlongs. Of the Cambridge eight, six participated in last year's contest; while of the Oxford crew four were ancient mariners, but the coxswain was a novice of the Thames. At the conclusion of the race, which was a decidedly exciting one, the judges declared it a dead heat. It was pronounced the finest one ever rowed.

Mr. Hayes' Reason for Making a Cabinet Appointment.

By the way, Judge Patterson, of Terre Haute, who has just returned from Washington, says that he said to the President: "How did you happen to select Dick Thompson? I know Morton was straining every nerve to keep Tyner in the Cabinet, and the friends of Ben Harrison were pushing him for the place. Why, under these circumstances, did you pick out Thompson?"

The President replied, "Nearly forty years ago I heard him make a speech in Columbus, Ohio. I stood a square away, but I heard distinctly every word of his silvery voice, and his wonderful eloquence impressed me so that I have never forgotten it." Mr. Thompson says it was in the campaign of 1840, when he spoke the last time in Columbus.

I was studying the Secretary's (Thompson's) face carefully, and asked him, "Was your appointment a surprise?"

"I should say so," he replied. "It came like a clap of thunder out of a clear sky. The first intimation I had was a telegram asking if I would accept a Cabinet position, and asking my choice between Secretary of War, Secretary of the Interior and Postmaster General. I did not know what to say or think. I consulted some of my friends, and finally in the matter of choice determined to take plenty of sea-room. No," added he, after a moment, "I had no more idea of ever again entering public life than I had of committing suicide."—Cincinnati Commercial.

Destruction of Birds by Telegraph Wires.

It is the opinion of Dr. Elliott Coues that in the United States many hundred thousands of birds are yearly killed by telegraph wires. To show that this estimate is not extravagant, he cites his own observation while journeying from Denver, Col., to Cheyenne, Wy., the road for a considerable part of the way coinciding with the line of the telegraph. The most abundant birds of that region at the time (October) were horned larks and Maccown's bunting. "Almost immediately upon riding by the telegraph wire," writes Dr. Coues in the American Naturalist, "I noticed a dead lark; and as I passed several more in quick succession my attention was aroused. The position of the dead birds enabled me to trace cause and effect before I actually witnessed a case of the killing. The bodies lay in every instance nearly or directly beneath the wire. A crippled bird was occasionally seen fluttering along the road. Becoming interested in the matter, I began to count, and desisted only after actually counting 100 in the course of one hour's leisurely riding—representing, perhaps, a distance of three miles." During the hour he saw three birds strike the wire; of these one had a wing broken, and another was dying in convulsions.—Popular Science Monthly for April.

Margarine.

In France a patent has been taken out for the manufacture of margarine, and it is to be sold on condition that it is not described as butter. It is made of the fat of beef, mixed with milk and cream, is said to keep longer than ordinary butter, and has the additional advantage of cheapness. It is used in France for cooking purposes, and is also purchased in large quantities by the poorer classes.

RETRIBUTION.

An Atrocity of Twenty Years Ago Punished—Execution of John D. Lee at Cedar City, Utah—A Sketch of the Awful Crime and its Consequences.

CEDAR CITY, Utah, March 24.

John D. Lee was shot at Mountain Meadows yesterday morning at 11 o'clock. The execution occurred within about 200 yards of the spot where, twenty years ago, he decoyed the emigrants out, and nearly the same distance from the monument. About 100 persons witnessed the execution. His manner was cool and collected, and he either failed to realize or was indifferent to the terrible fate so soon awaiting him. He said he was perfectly resigned to his fate, and was willing to meet his God and the emigrants. The only thing he dreaded was leaving his families and children, fifty in number. He believed he was being sacrificed, and expressed great bitterness against Brigham Young, whom he accused of leading the Mormons to destruction.

He took off his overcoat and as coolly seated himself on the head of his coffin as though he was taking a seat by a comfortable fire. The Marshal, in a clear, steady voice, read the death warrant, to which the condemned paid little attention, but asked to make a statement. He spoke of the solemnity of the occasion, his willingness to die, his innocence, as being the best friend the United States had, and of Brigham Young, whom he accused of going back on one who had served him, but he stood firm in the faith, spoke of his family, and was from the first affected to tears. All were kneeling, and the prisoner by his coffin. Rev. Mr. Stokes offered prayer. Lee again seated himself, and told the men at the wagons not to mangle his legs, but to aim for his heart; said he was not at all excited, and that he could give the word to fire himself. He had his photograph taken seated on his coffin, and requested that one be sent to each of his wives, Rachel, Caroline, and Sarah. The Marshal bandaged his eyes. He would not permit his hands to be tied, but had them clasped over his head. About the last thing, he told the boys to aim well up, and murmured something against Brigham Young. The Marshal gave the command: "Make ready! Take aim! Fire!" John D. Lee fell quietly back on his own coffin, his feet resting on the ground, and died without a struggle. Five balls passed through the region of his heart. He never moved. He displayed the most extraordinary courage, and met his fate either in the belief that he was a martyr or a hero, and in any event he died with a fortitude and resignation that made death easy.

CONFESSION OF LEE.

At the time of Lee's first trial, in September of last year, he wrote out and intrusted to his counsel, W. W. Bishop, a paper purporting to be his confession, with instructions not to give it to the public until after his execution. This confession is now published for the first time. Lee says he was born at Kaskaskia, Randolph county, Ill., on Sept. 6, 1812, and was christened in the Catholic faith; married Agatha Ami Woolsey in 1833, and removed to Fayette county, Ill., where he became wealthy; removed to Jackson county, Mo., in 1836, and joined the Mormon Church. When the Mormons were expelled from Missouri he followed them to Nauvoo, Ill., and subsequently to Salt Lake City, and was prominent in their councils. Lee says the Mountain Meadow massacre was the result of the teachings of Brigham Young, and was done by order of those high in authority in the Mormon community. The immediate orders for the deed were issued by Col. Dame, Lieut. Col. Haight, and the Council held at Cedar City, Utah. Fifty-eight Mormons and about 500 Indians participated in the butchery, which was accomplished only by the use of the basest treachery. The emigrants were induced to give up their arms by promises that they should not be molested, and would receive safe conduct out of the Territory. The work of killing the women and large children was assigned to the Indians, while the Mormons killed the men, including the sick and wounded. It is needless to say that the awful work was effectually and thoroughly performed. Lee says 17 small children were all that were spared. About 135 men, women and children were ruthlessly shot down like wild beasts. The orders were to spare no children that could talk and would be likely to remember and reveal to the world the circumstances of the horrid deed. The dead were stripped and mutilated, and the corpses left on the field. Lee went to Salt Lake City ten days after the massacre and made his report to Brigham Young. The latter approved the act, saying: "I have direct evidence from God that the act was a just one, and that it was in accord with God's will. I sustain you and all your brethren in all you did. All I fear is treachery on the part of the brethren concerned. Go home and tell them I sustain them. Keep all secret as the grave. I will make a report to the United States Government that it was an Indian massacre."

THE CRIME FOR WHICH LEE WAS EXECUTED—COLD-BLOODED SLAUGHTER OF ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY EMIGRANTS.

Enriched by the earlier discoveries in the gold mines of California, a party of Arkansas miners returned in 1856 to their late homes with light hearts and full pockets to take back to the land of gold their household gods, wives, children and friends. The story of their success inflamed the hearts of all their neighbors, and very soon a large party got ready and set out, liberally provided for the trip across the continent. The emigrant train must have numbered about 140 souls in all, and in property and money, horses, furniture and camp equipments was rich beyond all comparison with the emigrant trains then moving westward. The men were well armed for defense against roaming bands of Indians, and all cherished high hopes of a safe and comfortable journey and a prosperous future in their intended new home in the gold fields. Before they had proceeded very far into the Territory of Utah the Mormons became informed of their approach, and, deeming this an excellent opportunity for revenge and plunder, called a council, at which it was determined to order out the Mormon militia, "to follow and attack the accursed Gentiles, and let the arrows of the Almighty drink their blood." Meantime the Mormons assured their unsuspecting victims by pretended friendly advice. They told them it was too late to cross the Sierra Nevada mountains by the old emigrant route. This was in the spring of 1857, and the emigrants were told their better way would be to go through Southern Utah and Nevada to Los Angeles. They proceeded as advised and passed unmolested for some days through the settlements of the Latter Day Saints. About the fourth day after passing through Cedar City the emigrant band camped in a little valley well grassed and watered and sheltered by hills on either side. It was a beautiful spot for a camp, and they admired its natural advantages, looking upon that as an earthly paradise which was so soon to be to them a field of frightful slaughter. While in camp at this point their first intimation of danger came in the form of what they believed to be an Indian surprise at the rear. The attack was sudden, but was met with the promptness that characterized the frontiersmen of that time. With great rapidity they packed their wagons in lines of breastworks, behind which were gathered their women and children. They dug trenches and arranged matters so that water and some fuel could be procured without leaving the shelter thus provided. Then, with their old long rifles, they kept at bay the attacking party without loss beyond that sustained in the capture of their animals, which were run off at the first fire.

For five days the assault was kept up and the defense sustained without any definite result being arrived at. All this time the appearances indicated that the attacking party were savages. They were dressed and painted like Indians, and imitated their ways so well as to completely deceive the emigrants. But, while there were probably a few Indians among the lot, the majority of those who harassed the unfortunate travelers were members of the Utah militia, headed by Maj. John D. Lee. While the siege lasted some of these fiends amused themselves by pitching quoits and indulging in other pastimes when temporarily relieved from duty. At last, finding the work too slow, Lee sent word back that his fight had not been wholly successful. On receiving this information Lieut. Col. Isaac C. Haight, of the militia, ordered out reinforcements, with instructions to those going to Lee's assistance that "all but the little children of the party were to be killed." Haight at this time had just returned from "military headquarters" at Parowan, where a military council had been held, and he was but giving utterance to the decrees of the "church" devoting the company to destruction. When the reinforcements joined Lee he massed all the troops near a little spring, and made them a speech, telling them "his orders from headquarters were to kill all but the little children." Then at the head of his command he approached the emigrant camp, most of his mock Indians having meanwhile discarded paint and feathers. As he advanced he sent out a flag of truce, to the great joy of the emigrants, who dressed a pretty young girl of their party all in white, and placed her outside their defenses, to show that they, too, were disposed to be friendly. Then followed a parley, and Lee told the emigrants the hills were alive with Indians. He advised them to leave their arms as a measure of safety, as the Indians wanted plunder and not blood, and his men would protect them back to the Mormon settlements. The emigrants at first objected, but finally consented, and marched out of their fortifications without the least apprehension of danger from their professed friends. Not an Indian was in sight at this time. By Lee's order the men were separated from the women and children, the latter going to the front. Half a mile the devoted band had scarcely gone from their camp when, at the monster Lee's command, they were shot dead, every one except the seventeen little children of the party, whose lives the "council" had ordered should be spared. One hundred and twenty men, women and children were slain in cold blood. Before the women of the party had all been killed one young girl is reported to have rushed from the crowd toward Lee. She first threw herself on her face before him and begged him to let her live. She then rose up and, twining her arms about his neck, cried to him to spare her; that she was going to California to join her lover, who anxiously awaited her there, and to whom she was to be married on her arrival. He repaid her confidence by dragging her aside with vile intent, and because she resisted him and tried to defend herself with a knife she chanced to have in her possession he shot her through the head.

For years after the perpetration of this daring crime the property of the murdered emigrants was openly used by their murderers, and the fate of the missing ones for some time remained a mystery, their death being laid at the door of the savages. Some Indians did participate in the massacre, but they waited for the white savages to set them an example in human butchery, only rushing from their ambush to surround the emigrants when, by Lee's order, the first shots had been fired. After the massacre the bodies of the murdered emigrants were left on the open prairie to be devoured by the wolves. So closely was the secret of this terrible deed guarded that not even in the northern Mormon settlements was it known for a long time that any white men had participated in the slaughter. The first authentic tidings of the fate of the emigrants reached the outside world through Mr. William H. Rogers, a Government Agent, who heard something of it while crossing the plains in charge of a treasure-train in 1857. The next year he was appointed Indian Agent in Utah, and was ordered to rescue the children whom it was believed the Mormons had saved from the savages.

With the impudence of brigands the "Latter-Day Saints" demanded a ransom for their release. Mr. Rogers refused the demand, and gathered the children together. To his amazement one of the children, then about 8 years old, told him one day that it was not Indians, but white men, that killed their parents. With a company of cavalry he went to the Mountain Meadows, where a horrible sight met his gaze. The skeletons of 120 men, women and children were spread upon the field, the flesh torn from the bones by hungry wolves, and bullet-holes through the heads of most of the victims. A large quantity of hair from the heads of the women was gathered up from the sage bushes, and all the remains were given a Christian burial. A few days afterward two Mormons called on Mr. Rogers and, telling him "their hearts were pressed with grief," said they would give him a true history of the Mountain Meadow massacre if he would spare their own lives. He told them to proceed, and then they related to him the story told above, naming Lee as the leader. Some blooded stock, wagons, carriages and other property owned by the emigrants, they said, had been taken to the Mormon tithing establishment and sold at public auction for the benefit of the "church." Brigham Young, it is said, kept one of the carriages and a piano for his own use. In the Mormon versions of the story of the massacre it was made to appear that the emigrants provoked both the Mormon settlers and the Indians in their progress through Utah. The Mormons said their destruction was chargeable to the Indians altogether, and that they were attacked because they had poisoned a spring at which cattle drank and died, and that Indians ate the flesh of these animals and died also. But this has been pronounced absolutely untrue by those who have investigated the matter, and it was well established both before and at the time of Lee's trial that the murder of the unsuspecting emigrants was but the execution of a well-laid plan ordered by the Mormon Council, and that Lee not only executed but exceeded his sanguinary orders. With his own hand he killed wounded women and children lying helpless after the first volley. He shot a man down who held a child in his arms and who knew and recognized him through his disguise.

In November, 1874, Lee was arrested, and was soon after indicted for participation in this fearful crime. He had evaded pursuit for a long time, living with one of his eighteen wives, an English woman, among the Navajoe Indians, where his hut was like an arsenal. His first trial continued through part of July and August, 1875, and on the testimony then adduced the jury failed to agree. During his trial his cell was searched, and elaborate preparations for an intended escape were discovered. At this time one of his wives tried to see him, and, meeting with a refusal, she assaulted the jailer. In September, 1876, he was again tried, and the jury found him guilty of murder in the first degree. Having, in that Territory, the right to choose whether he should be hanged, beheaded or shot, he chose the latter form of execution.

The Religious Test in New Hampshire.

The State of New Hampshire has again rejected the amendment to the State constitution striking out the word "Protestant" as a qualification for office. A provision of that kind has always been in the constitution of that State. The original constitution was adopted in 1784, was amended in 1792, and again in 1850. A State convention in 1876 was held to purpose amendments. The original constitution remains in force, but, except the repeal of the property-qualification of voters, has not been substantially changed. The constitution provides, as one of the qualifications for Governor, Senators, Representatives, and Counselors, and perhaps other officers, that they shall be professors of the "Protestant religion." The convention of 1850 and the convention of 1876 both submitted amendments striking out this religious test, and it now appears that the people in 1877 have rejected the amendments, as they did in 1850. These amendments were adopted in the convention by an unanimous vote; all the newspapers and all the candidates advocated the amendments. There was no public or avowed opposition before the election, and yet, according to the returns, the amendments have been rejected, and, of course, by a secret vote.

Beet-Root Crop in France.

The beet-root crop in France has fallen off disastrously in the last season. The roots have been for several years yielding a constantly-diminishing amount of sugar, and last summer only one-fourth the quantity obtained in the season of 1875 was realized. The average density of the beet-juice was this year 10 per cent. lower than last year, while the quantity of sugar obtained from each hectolitre of juice was about 3.60 kilogrammes, as compared with 3.88 in 1875. It is said that, whereas there were 438 factories at work in 1875, there are at present only 184 in operation.

AGRICULTURAL AND DOMESTIC

Around the Farm.

GLANDERS.—Glanders is an incurable disease, highly contagious and infectious, and the sooner you have the animal destroyed the better for your own safety, as well as for those who are liable to be exposed to the contaminating influences of this dreadful disease.

PAINT FOR OUTBUILDINGS.—Take three gallons of water and one pint of flaxseed, boil half an hour, take off and add water enough to make four gallons; let it stand and settle; pour off the water in a pail, and put in enough Spanish white to make it thick as common whitewash; then add half a pint of linseed oil, stir well, and apply with a brush.

A GREAT many people have not yet learned that it pays to keep pigs sheltered and dry. When the hog cholera begins its rounds they will not wonder why their pigs go among the first, when the fact is that it is among just such pigs, kept dirty, wet and unsheltered, that disease originates, and the result is loss to their owners and to many others.

FEATHER-EATING HENS.—If hens have the detestable habit—for it is that, and nothing more—of feather-eating, you have only to catch them, and with a knife scrape the sharp edge of the inside of their bills, so as to leave them blunt, and you will enjoy the fun of seeing the fowls grab at a feather and have it slip out of their mouth without pulling it from the victim.—Golden Rule.

HOW TO MAKE A SCARECROW.—The best scarecrow is a suspended looking-glass. Take two small, cheap mirrors, fasten them back to back, attach a cord to one angle, and hang them to an elastic pole. When the glass swings in the wind the sun's rays are reflected all over the field, even if it be a large one, and even the oldest and bravest of crows will depart precipitately should one of its lightning flashes fall on him.

DISTEMPER IN COLTS.—As a general rule no treatment is necessary beyond ordinary good nursing. The tumor that forms under the jaws (in the maxillary space) is sometimes tardy in forming an abscess. Warm poultices made of flaxseed and bran may be frequently applied over the tumor, which will be found very effectual. When the tumor has a soft, fluctuating feel, no time should be lost in opening it freely with a sharp knife.

CARE OF YOUNG STOCK.—In this latitude March and April are the hardest months of the year for young stock. They are more subject to cold, wet storms, which are more injurious than severe cold but dry weather. Besides, having stood the winter, and in most cases lower in flesh, they have not as much vitality to resist bad weather. The range in stalk fields and bright straw stacks is not as good, and in many cases farmers from the prospects begin to economize in feed. But to be saving of hay or stronger food in March and April, is poor economy with stock raisers. One good steer or heifer is worth more than two poor ones, and, if food be scarce, sell a part to provide amply for the balance. Look at the sales of steers 3 years old, weighing 2,100 and 2,200 pounds each, and selling for seven cents per pound, or $154 per head at the farm. It is easier and cheaper to feed one liberally than to half feed four to produce the same sum of money at the end of three years. And now is the time to save flesh and make money.

HOW FAR HE TRAVELS.—Farmers who are about putting the plow into the ground for their spring work may be interested to know just how many miles they have to travel in turning over an acre with different-sized plows. The Scientific Farmer figures the matter out as follows:

Breadth of Furrow Slice.	Space Traveled.
7 inches	14¼ miles
8 inches	12⅜ miles
9 inches	11 miles
10 inches	9 9-10 miles
11 inches	9 miles
12 inches	8¼ miles
20 inches	4 9-10 miles
24 inches	4 miles

From this table can be seen the gain, in the labor account with a crop, which comes from the use of a broad furrow in plowing. If we call sixteen miles a day the day's work for the horse, we plow but one and one-fourth acres a day, by making a nine-inch furrow; nearly two acres by making a twelve-inch furrow, and, when a gang-plow is used, which plows a twenty-four-inch furrow, the acreage is increased to nearly four. The use of an improved plow, which turns a broad furrow and pulverizes, is therefore an economy on land suited to its use, and there is a great gain from the use of a gang-plow under circumstances where it is applicable.

About the House.

BAKED INDIAN MEAL PUDDING.—One quart sweet milk, boil and stir into it one teacup meal; let it cool, and add four eggs, one-half cup butter, one cup sugar; bake three-quarters of an hour; eat with sauce; very nice.

DELICIOUS BROWN PUDDING.—One cup Graham, one of meal, one of sugar, one of cream, one of raisins, one-half of sweet milk, one egg, one teaspoonful soda; stir all together and bake one hour; with sauce this is a delicious pudding.

ICING THAT WILL NOT BREAK.—The whites of three eggs beaten very stiff, add one pound white sugar, with one table-spoonful corn starch, flour the top of the cake as soon as taken from the oven, put on the icing with a steel knife wet with warm water.

MAKING VINEGAR.—Take water, three gallons; molasses, one quart; and yeast, one pint. Warm them to 100 degrees, and place in a clean vinegar or whisky barrel, in a warm place. Leave out the bung for the admission of air, and in about three weeks' time it will be changed to good vinegar.

HOME-MADE INK.—Take half an ounce of extract of logwood, ten grains of bichromate of potash, and dissolve them in a quart of rain-water, in a bottle kept uncorked. The bottle should be perfectly clean and free from any other ink. Running the logwood in solution through a fine strainer will remove all sediment.

TO CLEAN BLACK CLOTH.—Dissolve one ounce of bicarbonate of ammonia in one quart of warm water. With this liquid wet the cloth, using a piece of flannel or black cloth for the purpose. After the application of this solution clean the cloth well with clear water, dry and iron it, brushing the cloth from time to time in the direction of the fiber.

CURE FOR HOUSEHOLD PLANTS.—When choice pot-plants look sickly and begin to show yellow or brown leaves, they are probably infested by that very small but exceedingly troublesome insect, the red spider. They cannot bear moisture, and can be killed by the water syringe, or a free use of the water-pot, without wetting the earth too much about the roots.

TO CLEAN FEATHERS.—White ostrich feathers may be thoroughly cleansed by taking four ounces of white soap, cut small, and dissolved in four pints of rather hot water. Convert the solution into a lather and introduce the feathers. Rub with the hand for about five minutes. After this wash in clear water as hot as the hand can bear. Shake until dry.

FACTS ABOUT COLORS.—A spoonful of ox gall to a gallon of water will set the colors of almost any goods soaked in it previous to washing. A teacupful of lye in a pail of water will improve the color of black goods. Nankin should be steeped in lye before being washed—it sets the color. A strong, clean tea of common hay will preserve the color of those French linens so much worn in summer. Vinegar in the rinsing water, for pink or green calicos, will brighten them. Soda answers for the same and for purple or blue.

Good-Humored Russians.

Every crowd has a physiognomy and a character of its own, and after experience of an English or an Irish crowd one is rather pleased with a Russian one. Not that it is particularly clean or savory, but it is so extremely good-natured and well-behaved. There is very little pushing or elbowing. Every one is courteous to his neighbors, and you are sure not to see any acts of brutality or to incur any danger in mixing in it. Smiling, good-natured faces are everywhere, no matter what the rank or position, for good-humor is indeed the chief Russian virtue. And then such a curious mixture of people in such a crowd!—merchants with long dark-blue or black caftans, reaching to their heels, and their cravats tied tight around their throats, not showing a shirt collar if they indeed have one; stout old women with silk kerchiefs wound about their heads so as to conceal their hair; shoemakers' boys and apprentices in what seems a dirty muslin dressing-gown; artisans in their blue working-blouses; the ordinary town peasant in his red shirt and high boots, and the mushik fresh from the country with coat of undyed homespun, cloths wound round his legs in lieu of stockings and sandals made of plaited linden bark; here and there a student with dirty shirt and long hair and most foul finger-nails, evidently of the idea that neatness is incompatible with learning; there will probably be a priest or two, and a few soldiers.—Scribner for April.

The Collapse of Planets.

The whole planetary regions seem to be filled with collections of matter—star-dust and meteorites. They are all revolving about the sun in eccentric orbits, and are doubtless slowly circling towards it. The zodiacal light is supposed to be only an immense aggregation of this material. Thus the thickening stratum as these strange bodies draw near to the sun shows that they are all slowly gathering to that great center of attraction.

The evident effect of the fall of any of the planets into the sun would be the diffusion of highly-heated vapors far out into the spaces that surround it—probably far enough to reach the next outlying planet, and thereby to increase its retardation and hasten its fall into the mighty caldron. So one by one the planets dissolve and their elements fill the void of space. The expanding gases catch up the waves of radiant heat that have long been wandering from planets and suns; and the nebula is again seething and surging with its mighty contending forces. Sun-system reaches out to sun-system, and star-galaxy mingles with star-galaxy, till through all the abysmal depths matter is again "without form and void, and darkness is upon the face of the deep." Chaos has returned once more, again to be breathed upon by the Omnipotent Spirit that reforms and re-creates.—Popular Science Monthly for April.

Anecdote of Secretary Thompson.

The Washington Star relates the following anecdote about the new Secretary of the Navy, Thompson: "At a dinner-party given by Secretary Sherman on Saturday evening to the members of the Cabinet and a few friends, the table was graced by a beautiful three-masted ship composed of flowers. On the main-mast was a small United States flag which Secretary Sherman said his little daughter had placed there. Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, said in his dry Yankee way to the Secretary of the Navy, who sat opposite to him, 'Well, Mr. Thompson, will you please tell us if that is the correct position for the American flag to occupy on a ship?' Everybody awaited the reply with interest, for it is well known that the new Secretary is no sailor, and they thought that he was cornered, but he took advantage of the Cabinet custom, and replied in a dignified manner, 'Ahem! I will refer you, sir, to the Attorney General.' The answer was greeted with peals of laughter."

The Turkish Army.

The Memorial Diplomatique of Jan. 27, 1877, gives the most explicit statement of the situation of the Turkish army that has yet been made, and probably the most reliable. From it we learn that the army of the Danube comprises 200,000 men, commanded by Abdul-Kerim Pasha, Generalissimo of the Turkish army. The corps of Servia and Bosnia, 100,000 strong, is commanded by Ali-Saib Pasha; the corps of Albania, 50,000 strong, by Dervish Pasha; the corps of observation on the frontier of Greece, 25,000 strong, by Ahmed-Chukri Pasha; the corps of Batoum, 40,000, by Hussein-Tahrin Pasha; the corps Erzeroum, 120,000 strong, by Samih-Pasha, and the corps of Bagdad, 55,000 strong, by Hussein-Fevzi Pasha. This would make a total of 590,000 Turkish troops in the field.

PREVENTION OF IRON-RUST.

[illegible]

A very important paper has lately been read before the Society of Arts by Mr. Barff, Professor of Chemistry to the Royal Academy, upon a method of preserving iron from rust by coating it with its own magnetic oxide. The facts which Prof. Barff has brought forward, and the specimens which he has exhibited, are such as to justify the belief that his discovery will prove to be one of enormous value, and that it will, indeed, render all all kinds of iron-work, however much exposed to weather or to corrosive vapors or liquids, practically indestructible and everlasting.

When an iron surface is exposed to the action of water, or of moist air, it speedily becomes covered by a film of protoxide, or ferrous oxide, which consists of 56 parts by weight of the metal to 16 parts of oxygen. The ferrous oxide continues to attract oxygen from the atmosphere, and is gradually converted into another compound, the sesquioxide, or ferric oxide, which is composed of twice 56 parts by weight of iron, and three times 16 parts by weight of oxygen. The ferric oxide, in its turn, gives up some of its oxygen to the as yet unoxidized iron beneath it, and the ferrous oxide thus formed is gradually converted into ferric oxide by the access of air through the spongy layer of superficial rust which covers it. In this way the first formed film of rust exposes to the atmosphere the surface which lies below it; and hence the rust becomes a carrier of oxygen to the deeper parts of the iron, until the latter is completely corroded and worn through. Many attempts have been made to protect iron surfaces by the application of some kind of paint or varnish; and these attempts have, of course, been to some partial extent successful. Such coatings, however, have no real adhesion to the metal on which they are placed, and are liable to scale off or to perish in a variety of ways. Even when the coating is generally sound, the smallest flaw in its continuity will give entrance to the enemy, for the rust from the exposed spot will spread laterally under the coating, and may be all the more dangerous and destructive from being partially concealed from view.

It is manifest that the evils incidental to rusting are entirely due to the unstable character of the two oxides already mentioned, which are formed spontaneously under ordinary climatic conditions. There is, however, a third oxide which possesses characteristics of a totally different kind, and which is uninfluenced, not only by moist air, but even by acids and other corrosive substances. This is the magnetic or black oxide, which consists of three times fifty-six parts by weight of iron, and four times sixteen parts by weight of oxygen. Prof. Barff has discovered that if any iron article is exposed, at a high temperature, to the action of superheated steam, it will become covered by a film of this black oxide, of a thickness which is determined by the degree of temperature and by the length of exposure. The oxide is harder than the original iron, and adheres to it even more firmly than the particles of iron adhere to each other, so that there is a gain not only in chemical, but also in mechanical resistance. If the operating chamber is heated only to 500 degrees Fahrenheit, and the exposure is continued for only five hours, a surface is obtained which will resist emery-paper for a considerable time, and which will not rust within doors, or after any moderate degree of exposure to moisture. If the oxidizing process is conducted at 1,200 degrees Fahrenheit, and continued for six or seven hours, the surface will resist a rasp and will bear any amount of exposure to weather. The oxidation does not affect the appearance of the surface in any other way than by turning it black. A rough forging retains its roughness, and a turned or polished surface its smoothness. If there should be any flaw in the coating, or if the black oxide is designedly removed from part of the surface, the common oxidation will occur where the iron is thus left unprotected. But such oxidation is strictly limited to the unprotected portion, and has not the smallest tendency either to spread laterally under the black oxide or to detach this from the subjacent parts.

Among the most valuable and important of the probable applications of the invention will be the protection of steam boilers and of the plates of iron ships; and Prof. Barff hopes that by certain arrangements it will be possible to operate upon very large manufactured articles without its being necessary to provide a heating-chamber large enough to contain them. The applications seem almost without number. The process will be conducted at very small cost, and it will probably be employed, at no distant time, for iron goods of every description. Not only so, but it will extend the applications of iron itself to several purposes for which its liability to rust hitherto rendered it unsuitable. Copper vessels will no longer possess any advantages for cooking, and iron saucepans will no longer need to be tinned. Leaden pipes for the conveyance of water will in all probability be entirely superseded; and there can be no doubt that new uses for incorrodible iron will every day suggest themselves.

Storing Green Hay.

The usual method of making hay is expensive and liable to risks, owing to the changeable weather at the haying season. To escape the danger of wetting and spoiling, experiments have been made with grass cut and stored in one day, and after only two hours' exposure to the sun. In these experiments the grass was cut as soon as free from dew, was then turned over once with the tedding-machine, and, after drying for two hours, was hastily gathered and removed to a tight barn. The barn was plastered on the inside, and had a tight floor and roof, and, as soon as the loads entered, the doors were closed and the hay immediately packed into the mows. The barn was then kept as nearly air-tight as possible, till the hay was consumed in the winter. By this method of quick gathering, and the perfect exclusion of rain, and the nearly-perfect exclusion of air, the hay was preserved sweet and in excellent condition, and was found to be more valuable as food for cattle than hay made in the ordinary way. The chief points of interest in this method of curing grass are the quick gathering and the use of tight buildings for the exclusion of moisture and air. The experiments made in this direction are reported to be very satisfactory, and the subject [illegible] to the attention of farmers in the variable climates of some of our States, both on the score of economy of time and labor and the improved quality of the hay.—Scribner for April.

ANTS.

Wonderful Things About These Little Insects.

[M. D. Conway's London Letter to the Cincinnati Commercial.]

The audience which, following Solomon's advice and Sir John Lubbock's reputation, went to the Royal on the 27th to consider the ways of the ant was vast, and they heard much that would, perhaps, have astonished Solomon, or the Persian sage Bhallish-herta, who told man not to be conceited about his social superiority, but to "observe the sovereignty of the bee and of the ant in their land." Sir John Lubbock has been known to be devoting his attention to ants for the last three years. He has clever assistants in his little daughter and her governess, who watch the proceedings in the ant-room during the day, and report progress if he has been absent. Living on a farm adjoining that of Charles Darwin, he has the benefit of consultations with that great man (against whose high name some forger recently aimed a blow in Carlyle's name, which Carlyle has denounced).

Sir John's story last night was most extraordinary. He declared that though the ape ranks next man in form, the ant ranks next him in intellect, and if the ants should ever be able to make up by numbers for their deficiency of size they might be able to cope with man on no unequal terms. There are 700 known species of ants, of which there are thirty in this country, and Sir John has based his researches on twenty species, which are now sharers of his hospitality. For a liberal and a moral man, Sir John does not seem to observe rigid principles with these tiny creatures; he sets some as slaves to others, and on one occasion gave an ant-company of thirty so much drink that they were reduced to hopeless intoxication. On this last occasion the sober ants pitched five of the inebriates into the water, and took twenty-five into the nest to recover. But of a similar party of "strangers" (namely, not belonging to their nest) the sober ants pitched twenty-five into the water, took five into the nest, but presently brought four of these out and pitched them into the water too.

The ants know their comrades after long separation. Sir John separated one from his nest for a year, then brought him back, and with him a "stranger" of the same species, marking them with paint for recognition. The ants treated the stranger nefariously, but welcomed their long-lost brother and wiped the paint off him. There is a little yellow ant in England which regularly raises poultry; it stores up through winter the eggs of aphides, which, being hatched in spring, give them a good supply of provisions. The differentiation of labor among them is remarkable, some being developed into soldiers, others of the same nest as laborers, and others as commissariat agents. Sir John found that two particular ants were invariably sent out to bring in food placed at the door, and when these were removed by him, two others were appointed who came just as invariably, and so on so often as the special officials were removed.

The ants keep a more various stock of animals for their provisions than Englishmen do; and there are two tiny creatures—an aphis and a beetle—always found in their nests, but never eaten or used, apparently their cat and dog. Slavery prevails, and there is no anti-slavery society. But Sir John remarked the evil effects of the system. The most determined slaveholder is called "Polyergus," a queer misnomer, since the bloated creature doesn't work at all. By employing slaves (which are very black) this big red ant has lost all cleverness, all strength, and even his mandibles; he is perhaps the only animal in nature that cannot even feed himself, but will die amid plenty unless Sir John sends in slaves every day to cram the food down his throat. It is the great middle class who hold no slaves who develop the marvelous intelligence and enterprise displayed by ants.

Ashtabula.

The special commission appointed by the Legislature of Ohio to investigate the late Ashtabula disaster has made its report. The commission, after going into details showing the imperfections in the bridge, report the following as their conclusions:

1. There were 80 to 100 lives lost by the failure of the bridge.

2. The bridge went down under an ordinary load by reason of defects in its original construction.

3. The defect in the original construction of the bridge could have been discovered at any time after its erection by a careful and analytical inspection, such as the importance of the structure demanded, and thus the sacrifice of life and property prevented. The truth is, the bridge was liable to go down any time during the last ten or eleven years under a load that might at any time be brought upon it in the ordinary course of the company's business, and it is most remarkable that the disaster did not sooner occur. It would be needless to say that an engineer would be derelict in his duty who did not provide in his construction of a bridge against wind, snow, ice, and the vibration of a rolling load. They are as much to be anticipated and provided against as the law of gravity.

This report is accompanied by a bill specifying how bridges of different spans shall be constructed.

Use Short Words.

Gov. Seymour finds enjoyment in confining himself, as far as possible, in his correspondence, to words of one or two syllables. He recommends this as a profitable and entertaining practice to young writers, saying that in searching for short words the students will learn many new things about common words and their meaning. He also says that he has learned a great deal from the simple forms of speech used by his Indian chief friends of the Oneida and Onondaga tribes, and commends their style as a model of simplicity and expressiveness.

Descent of a Comet on Our Sun.

Supposing there really is, I will not say danger, but a possibility, that our sun may one day, through the arrival of some very large comet traveling directly towards him, share the fate of the suns whose outbursts I have before described, we might be destroyed unawares, or we might be aware for several weeks of the approach of the destroying comet. Suppose, for example, the comet, which might arrive from any part of the heavens, came from out that part of the star-depths which is occupied by the constellation Taurus—then, if the arrival were so timed that the comet, which might reach the sun at any time, fell upon him in May or June, we should know nothing of that comet's approach, for it would approach in that part of the heavens which was occupied by the sun, and his splendor would hide as with a veil the destroying enemy. On the other hand, if the comet, arriving from the same region of the heavens, so approached as to fall upon the sun in November or December, we should see it for several weeks. For it would then approach from the part of the heavens high above the southern horizon at midnight. Astronomers would be able in a few days after it was discovered to determine its path and predict its downfall upon the sun, precisely as Newton calculated the path of his comet, and predicted its near approach to the sun. It would be known for weeks then that the event which Newton contemplated as likely to cause a tremendous outburst of solar heat, competent to destroy all life upon the surface of our earth, was about to take place; and, doubtless, the minds of many students of science would be exercised during that interval in determining whether Newton was right or wrong. For my own part, I have very little doubt that, though the change in the sun's condition in consequence of the direct downfall upon his surface of a very large comet would be but temporary, and in that sense slight—for what are a few weeks in the history of an orb which has already existed during thousands of millions of years?—yet the effect upon the inhabitants of the earth would be by no means slight. I do not think, however, that any students of science would remain, after the catastrophe, to estimate or record its effects.—Richard Proctor, in Belgravia.

Secretary Fish's Expenses.

Mr. Evarts will find it a very difficult task to maintain the social side of the State Department with more dignity than Hamilton Fish has done. It seems necessary that the Secretary of State should be both rich and a man of culture. The custom has grown up, and it certainly is a dignified and creditable one, that the Secretary of State must give frequent and elaborate entertainments to the diplomatic corps, and to any visiting strangers of distinction from foreign countries. The Secretary of State is not only expected to manage all difficult international problems, but to be as well the exponent of national courtliness and hospitality. He is supposed to be a genial, dignified, international good fellow, who pays all his bills. But it takes money to do it. Mr. Fish, in his private monetary matters, is said to be very close, but he has been lavishly generous in his management of the courtesies of the Government. He has spent every year his entire salary in house-rent. He has maintained a good establishment, and has dispensed the hospitalities of the nation in a style of which all of us may be proud. And he has not taxed the people for it, but has paid for it out of his own bank account. From the best sources I know that it has at times cost Mr. Fish $50,000 a year to live in this city and maintain the dignity of the State Department. His salary was $8,000.—Washington Cor. Troy Times.

The Imperturbable Passenger.

A train boy on the Illinois road found a rather tough customer in an old gentleman of composed mein, who received all shots as if he were bullet-proof. The boy bombarded him with papers, and pamphlets, and candies and bound books, and nuts, and fruits of one kind and another. But it was no good. Had the elderly party been lined inside with brass he could not have shown greater indifference. The boy fretted under his treatment, as was plain to be seen. He had passed the cigars some thirty times, and without success, when he said, in a tone of desperation:

"Try some of these cigars, and if they don't kill you within a month I'll give you the money back."

The man was somewhat amused by that, but he had the boy. He said:

"If I am dead how can you give me the money?"

"I'll give it to your family, then."

"But I ain't got no family."

"Well, I'll give it to the family next door," persisted the boy.

"But there ain't no family next door," said the man, with the smile lengthening his face.

"Oh, there'll be one move in when they hear you are dead," was the quick reply.

The elderly passenger shut up like a borrowed knife.—Danbury News.

The Beginning.

Remember that those who are drunkards did not intend to become so; they only thought of drinking just a little; but the little kept increasing, and the love of drink kept growing stronger, until the eyes grew red, and the face grew bloated, and the step grew unsteady; until the one who might have been a blessing to the world and a help to those around him has become a loathsome object and a terror to his friends. It is not safe to take even a little strong drink; because the love for it so soon becomes a strong and cruel master.

Three-Cent Pieces.

There is no provision of law for the redempton or exchange of silver three-cent pieces; and they are a legal tender for not more than thirty cents in any one payment. The coinage of these pieces was first authorized by the act of March 3, 1851, which required them to be composed of three-fourths silver and one-fourth copper. The act of March 3, 1853, changed the fineness to 900 parts silver and 100 parts copper.

THE crops in Los Angeles county, Cal., this year are divided as follows: 25,000 acres in barley, 20,000 in corn, and about 10,000 in wheat.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND.

Solomon Schaff was [illegible]
Eager to [illegible]
[illegible]
If only the [illegible] gave.
Now the reason for this recital
Is merely to show that in saving his pelf
This [illegible] outwitted himself,
And met with a fit requital.

On his fortieth birthday Solomon Schaff
Began to dream of a "better half,"
And to tire of his bachelor living;
Of course, as he was abnormally thin,
He fancied a fair one with double chin.
"I'm lean and she's fat,
There's profit in that,"
Quoth he; "I get more than I'm giving."

"Courtship's a very extravagant thing,"
Said Solomon Schaff. "She'll look for a ring
For bonbons, bouquets, and all that;
But shall I waste my cash
On such profitless trash?
No, indeed, I'm too sharp for a flat!"

Howe'er, [illegible] wedding day [illegible],
Mr. Schaff [illegible] with a [illegible]
So he [illegible]
"I want a portrait, you [illegible] some [illegible]," Briefly he said to young [illegible] Flash;
"A half-length will do,
[illegible] for you,
You'd [illegible]."

Well, Flash [illegible], as [illegible] was struck
"Ho! ho! [illegible]!"
And he scarce could smother a titter.
Flash worked away like a busy elf,
But he whistled [illegible] and laughed to himself,
As he [illegible].

A week had [illegible] to Schaff's delight,
Flash wrote [illegible] picture [illegible] finished quite
And [illegible] directions,
Most carefully packed, to Miss Caroline Reed
Please hand to the bearer the price as agreed,
And be sure, worthy friend,
Such a present must tend
To increase her respect and affection."

Quickly the check was written and sent,
And the evening brought Solomon, well content
To sit by the side of his charmer;
But, alas! what a cruel reversal is this!
She turns away from his proffered kiss,
And with looks of scorn
She bids him "begone!"
As if his mere presence could harm her

"What is it?" poor Solomon, wondering, cries.
The lady surveys him with wrathful surprise,
Then suddenly raising a curtain:
"Your present!" in angriest tones she exclaimed
And there stood a picture most showily framed,
But veiled in a shadow uncertain.

Nearer, still [illegible] Solomon drew,
But he started [illegible]—what is this meets his view?
A half-[illegible] the artist had [illegible];
But, dreadful [illegible], the half that Flash chose
Began at Sol's [illegible]-chin and stopped at his toes
'Twas too [illegible] joke!
Poor Schaff never spoke,
But [illegible] the carpet he [illegible].

My[illegible] is [illegible]—
Miss Reed, stern and cold,
Would listen to no explanation;
And Solomon's life
Was uncheered by a wife,
To his own great chagrin and vexation.

PITH AND POINT.

A BOSTON boy—Hub-bub.

EARLY to bed and early to rise,
Makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise;
But early to read and tardy to bed,
Makes a man's nose turn a cardinal red.

"OH, yes," said an old lady, "the modern cook-stove is a great invention, and when my boy James gets through his studies in practical engineering, so he can come home and run it, I'll buy one of 'em, but not afore."

"NO," said the smart boy-baby, when the pretty young woman wanted to kiss him. "But why not?" asked she. "Oh, I am too little to kiss you; papa will kiss you; papa kisses all the big girls." He was permitted to play with his toys.

There is another like him, I know—I've been on his trail for a month—just let me catch him at it, that's all."

IN Brooklyn the other day, a young man named Samuel C. Spooner attempted to shoot his sweetheart, Louisa Horne, for no other reason, it is said, than that she refused to marry him. Samuel was determined, it would seem, to "make a Spooner spoil a Horne."

AN old maid was heard to exclaim, while sitting at her toilet the other day: "I can bear adversity, I can encounter hardship, and withstand the changes of fickle fortune; but oh, to live, and droop, and die like a single pink—I can't endure it; and what's more, I won't."

Figures are what is wanted

Not election majorities, but such as interest the great army of American producers. Twenty-five years ago the eight counties of Missouri, now traversed by the Old Reliable Hanibal & St. Joseph Railroad were nearly a wilderness. To-day, by a late census, it is discovered that these counties produce over one-fourteenth of the entire wheat crop of the entire State, over one-twelfth of the corn crop, and over one-ninth of the oats. The same growth of country is now being repeated in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and New Mexico, and the immortal Greeley had this identical route and section of country in mind when he breath those stirring words of wisdom, "Young man, go West." Therefore, it is but naturla that parties taking this advice should desire to pass over a road that has done so much for a great State, (especially as it offers the best facilities) and see for themselves. By the Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad, through cars are run from Cleveland and Toledo, and thro' connections made from Cincinnati and Indianapolis, via Quincy, to St. Jo., Atchison and Kansas City, and from Chicago to Kansas City without change. We are about to issue, in connection with our own, a county map of Colorado and New Mexico, giving valuable information as regards time tables, routes, distances, altitudes, &c., which we will be pleased to furnish free, upon application in person or by letter addressed to

In the Sweet By-and-By.

Cannot but be the happy thought as the fortunate recipient of the "Rocky Mountain Tourist" scans its wonderfully attractive pages and peruses its fascinating descriptions. Most beautifully embellished with new and highly artistic engravings, its letter press a model of typographical richness, and the arrangement throughout simply superb, the Rocky Mountain Touaist is worthy of comparison with "Picturesque America or The Aldine" It is written in gossipy, graphic style, covering details of the tour through the garden of the Southwest (the Arkansas Valley, Southern Kansas), to the very heart of the Alps of America—the Rocky Mountains, Jaunts are made to all the famous resorts of Colorado, the remarkable ruins, the springs, the mines, and, in short, to every point of interest to tourists, agriculturists, capitalists, miner, and invalid. With the Tourists, the San Juan Guide keeps fitting company, and the two publications are mailed free to all writing for one or both to T. J. ANDERSON, Topeka, Kansas.

FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1877.

Foremost among the quiet entertainments of the Lenten season so nearly at its close, have been the reunions at the Cushing House, on C Street, at which some of the most accomplished visitors to the capital have been seen.

One of the most conspicuous of these soirees was interesting to lovers of the elocutionary art, in the Introduction of a new professor, and lovely woman, in the person of Mrs. Ella Hoyt Rolph.

Some will remember how warmly New York set the seal of her approbation upon the debutante, earlier in the winter, at Steinway Hall and with what especial success she has appeared in this city in private, they have only to learn that she is fresh, young and as impressionable as she is impressive. In person, of medium height and slight proportions, yet well-rounded and supple, she shows flexibility of action, in good keeping with her fluent method, which betrays Murdock's teachings.

Possessed of an expressive face, dovelik eye and bonny brown hair, her voice is as low, gentle and silvery as the most pathetic passages require, while its compass attains masculine range in the climax of richness and fire in the tragic delineations.

She is a complete surprise to an audience. Stepping before them with unaffected grace and simplicity, she appears, at first glance, only a pretty woman; but ere three lines have been recited by her millifluous tongue, the clear, artistic enunciation a dramatic force stamp her a genius. Not only her friends, but the public are in sympathy with this developement, which under the careful training of Murdock and Neudenhoff, already evinces the greater success she is expected to make in the future with her peculiar gifts.

Mrs. Rolph was ably assisted by a voluntary corps amateurs. Major Atley of Philadelphia, interpreted Dutch humor with much vim and drollery. This gentleman is otherwise known as a versatile journalist. Interspersed between Mrs. Rolph's rendition of "The Creed of the Bells," which exhibits her voice in its greatest power, and a scene from Macbeth, in which her best study is manifested, were songs by Miss Runkle, daughter of General Runkle—Mrs. Runkle, a beautiful woman, was also present. Her daughter, who is a blonde of unusually abundant light tresses, Greek profile and soft contour of both face and figure, delighted the guests with her pure soprana voice, in the favorite "Waiting" and one or two opera songs.

At intervals the lancers alternated with the "glide." Other ladies participated in the activities of the evening. Miss Campbell, a dashing brunette of coal-black hair and eyes, and pale complexion, set off by cardinal tints well disposed about her dress, sang with Dr. Harvey several Mendelssohn duets, with much taste, Their voices blended nicely.

Among the strangers whose name is so recently on every lip, was General M C. Butler, the Senator elect, of South Carolina, of the Hampton Brigade, which is gaining adherents rapidly, and by many is considered a settled government. Another of the notable names in history was represented by an ex-U. S. A. officer, Captain John Quincy Adams—a descendant of the long line of Presidents and Ambassadors of New England—he hails from the Quaker City as an agreeable gentleman and society beaux among the fashionable belles of Centennial renown and aristocratic lineage.

To enumerate the ladies of a household, whose hospitalities during the past winter have been prominent outside of their own salon, is to mention woman of more than ordinary calibre—for the Cushing House has not of late acquired a reputation in this regard; those of other seasons have been noted as some of the "choicest" ladies in the city, where most bright people do congregated.

At present, there is a full coterie of accomplished and entertaining guests, representing the learned profession, the arts, etc.

To meet them on Friday evening has been the gala-time for reception and inspection, when the in-coming groups assembled by the salute of Mr. Morrow's baton to his violin, and the signal for gay and festive trippings.

This gentleman, by the way, is the genial master of ceremonies and Director of the amusement. He was the recipient a few nights since, of a service of silver-plate from the guests, for these pleasant amenities he has so generously bestowed. Some delicious verses were addressed to him in memory of his "distinguished unselfishness," and delivered with admirable emphasis by the Baltimore belle, Mrs. Ella Lee Hardenbrook, to whose sparkling pen and fine conception, other witty effusions have been attributed in magazines and journals of the day.

She made a decided "hit" on this occasion.

To have watched the eager faces of the surrounding crowd, as the "points told" in her facetious description, would have been a pose worthy of Brady's skill, and it is a pity he could not have photographed the medley groupe to hang besides his Electoral Commission.

Near the fair Portia stood the whole-souled Mrs. Snell, by her handsome husband, the Judge—acknowledged to be the best dancer in the house. Mrs. S. is an advocate of Right over Might, and Woman over all, which does eminent credit to her heart and head—the curly head which belongs to her (and the owner, the Judge). In her vicinity stood Mrs. Wheeler, of Buckingham and Houghton decent. She is a relation of Lord Moncton Miles, the Sir Henry Houghton, who was so late a visiter this to country, whom America honored in various ways. Mrs Wheeler is ethereal, and fair as a lily in her appearance, full of charm and talent. There were Mr. and Mrs. Dennison, of the ex-Governor's family; Mrs. D——'s Spanish features and complexion, mobile and strong, make her a central figure—one that in the days of the French Revolution would have marked her as a Mme Reland, in grand sentiments and masculine thought. Mrs. D—— is a lady of refinement and high tone. Then the silver curls of Mrs. Armstrong, of the Bourbon profile and argumentation temperment, with merry eyes, loomed up, Then there were Captain and Mrs. Snow, blond and brunette, and Mrs. Carr, with the silver curls and dark eyes, and Miss. Georgia Snow, whose ability has stamped her a woman of progress—a clerk in the Money Department—and front rank of brainy woman—a vivacious and brilliant conversationalist. Mrs. Major Atley, one of the old Army Regulars—a sister of General Hunt, of the Fifth Artillery, and a lady of elegance and style. There were Mrs. Sanborn, and Mrs. John Sanborn, of Virginia; she has distinguished manners and grey hair. Her son is said to be a very fine musician and scholarly lawyer. There were Miss. Mary Cushing, of the lustrous black eyes and auburn hair, with pearly skin. Miss Cushing is a young lady of political tastes, who converse with Parliamentry zeal and knowledge on the men of the past, and their measures. Her brother, Wm. Henry Cushing, is gifted with a rich, baritone voice, and handsome features. He is a graceful dacer.

The reporters were not far off, and Miss Mary Gay Robinson with her wide-awake hazel eyes, which have a pensive shadow, occasionally sketched mental photographs; and her brother, Mr. Henry, sang with her those pathetic ballads that send the thougots inward to wander in dreams.

Then in the pause succeeding, the adieus were taken, and it was ove.

Public School.

Perhaps there is no institution which lies closer to the hearts of the American people than their public schools. These are the stepping stones from which the masses are enabled to reach dignity and honor and renown, and they are generally supported with a liberality not accorded to other departments of public affairs. We growl about the expense of other institutions, but it is seldom that we deny anything that is demanded to promote the usefulness of the schools in which our children are being trained in morals as well as mathematics. One would suppose that these vital agencies of general education, which have so important a bearing on the future lives of our little ones, would be so well provided that only the best men to be secured would be entrusted with the delicate work, and that no other pursuit in life could offer a superior financial attraction to those who are successful teachers. But the contrary is the case. As a general thing our teachers are the very worst paid class of professional man and women, and even the bar-room offers more profit than the school room. In 70 there were about the same number of schools as retail seller in the United States, yet our liquor bills amount to nearly eight times as much as our tuition bill. The total cost of schools and teachers in 1870 was only $95,402,726, while the direct cost of our liquors reached the enourmous sum of $595,575,000! What a contrast there is here. We pay the teachers nearly a hundred millions to train our children in morals and knowledge, and we pay the bar-keeper eight times as much to train them in drunkenness and profligacy.

REVENGE OF RAIN-IN-THE-FACE.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

In that desolate land and lone,
Where the Big Horn and Yellowstone
Roar down their mountain path,
By their fires the Sioux chiefs
Muttered their woes and griefs,
And the menace of their wrath.

"Revenge!" cried Rain-in-the-Face,
"Revenge upon all the race
Of the White Chief with yellow hair!"
And the mountains, dark and high,
From their crags re-echoed the cry
Of his anger and despair.

In the meadow, spreading wide
By woodland and river side
The Indian village stood;
All was silent as a dream,
Save the rushing of the stream
And the blue-jay in the wood.

In his war-paint and his beads,
Like a bison among the reeds,
In ambush the Sitting Bull
Lay with three thousand braves
Crouched in the clefts and caves,
Savage, unmerciful!

Into the fatal snare
The White Chief with yellow hair
And his three hundred men
Dashed headlong, sword in hand;
But of that gallant band
Not one returned again.

The sudden darkness of death
Overwhelmed them, like the breath
And smoke of a furnace fire;
By the river's bank, and between
The rocks of the ravine,
They lay in their bloody attire.

But the foeman fled in the night,
And Rain-in-the-Face, in his flight,
Uplifted high in air
As a ghastly trophy bore
The brave heart, that beat no more,
Of the White Chief with yellow hair.

Whose was the right and the wrong?
Sing it, oh funeral song,
With a voice that is full of tears,
And say that our broken faith
Wrought all this ruin and scathe,
In the Year of a Hundred Years.

MARRIED PEOPLE.

Mrs. Danford went to the depot to meet her husband when he came back from the West. Three years ago the firm had taken him from his desk as bookkeeper and sent him out on collecting tours; he had been coming and going ever since, but his wife never could get used to it. Before that she never left the house except to go to church or market, but now she went to the depot whenever he was coming home, after even a day's absence, once going to Harrisburg, when the train was delayed there, in the middle of the night. Her children thought their mother had all the good sense and even temper there was in the world; but her husband knew that nobody was so excitable and weak as she. It was curious to see how she could single out the stooped, red-headed little man in his linen duster among the thousands pouring out of the depot, and how, though she was one of the timidest women alive, she would go straight to him, as though the men about her were so many dead trunks of trees.

He always explained to her how it was impossible for her to go with him now as she used to do on those little excursions when they were first married.

"We haven't the money, Lizzy, and, then, who would stay with the children?"

"Oh, yes, I know, Richard, that I can't go."

Of course she knew, and he knew that she knew. But he explained it to her every time. If he noticed that her laugh was not steady, or that her chin was quivering, he would go on making droll adventures out of every little happening of his journey, until she laughed in good earnest, and gradually the talk would slip back to those old jaunts of theirs—the time they went trout-fishing up to Nittany, or that week they spent in Baltimore when they were snow-bound at Havre de Grace. Elizabeth could remember every excuse the fat old conductor made. She had traveled very little.

"In about ten years Charley will be in business, and I shall have made my pile, and we will take Nelly and go to Europe."

That was a standing joke between them. But they seriously did hope that the time might come when they could afford to stay together. "The worst pull will be over when Charley has his schooling," Danford would say, "and then I can save up and go into some little business of my own. I'll never leave you then, Lizzy."

They rode home together this evening in the horse-cars, she carrying his overcoat while he took the valise. The ride was long and the car crowded, for it was raining. During the month that Danford had been gone, the family had taken possession of a little house which was to be their home. He had long ago joined one of those building societies by which, in Philadelphia, a man so easily secures his own house. Instead of building a new one, he had, to please her, bought one of those old stone cottages on the outskirts of Germantown; its hip-roof and orchard of old apple-trees gave it a picturesque dignity beside the staring blocks of its pretentious neighbors.

Mrs. Danford, in a half-whisper, was talking all the way, not giving her husband a chance to say a word.

"And the parlor carpet—you would be astonished to see how beautifully it fits; but I wrote to you about that. And I took the shelves out of the linen closet and made of it a work-room for Charley—his books and printing-press and rubbish, you know; and the room with two windows is going to be Nelly's——"

"Baby's?" Danford chuckled, knowing that his wife, although baby was 4 years old, never slept until the little hands were nestled in her bosom.

"She must have a room of her own soon. You will give her that one?—promise me Richard. I have papered it myself—pale blue—and her bed is all ready," she said, anxiously, touching his arm.

"You can arrange it as you choose," carelessly. "How long this ride out is!" glancing impatiently at the dropping rain outside.

"It is long. We might have taken the steam-cars for once," hesitating.

"No; we must save every penny now. There are the bills for moving to pay—What is the matter?"—for a sudden change had come over his wife's face as she looked over his shoulder. He turned sharply, and faced a tall man in an oil-skin coat, who was holding by a strap and watching Mrs. Danford with what appeared at the first glance to be a look of keen significance. It instantly deadened out of his face, and he turned to Danford a pair of heavy black eyes as unmeaning as the flabby, close-shaven cheeks below them.

"Why, I thought that fellow was going to speak to you," he said, as he helped her out of the car. He was used to seeing Lizzy attract notice. He always thought of her as his middle-aged wife—Charley's mother—unless when people turned to look after her as she came into a car, and when he saw how singular and delicate was the beauty that still hung about her, and how the smile in her pale face.

"Whew! how it pours!" he said. "Step up on this porch, Betty, until I hoist the umbrella."

Several other passengers had left the car, and stood huddled together, struggling with their umbrellas and the wind. Next to Mrs. Danford the man was in an oil-skin coat. His mouth was muffled in it, and the pelting rain drowned every other sound, but it seemed as though he spoke to her.

"To-morrow, at noon," she answered. "I shall be alone."

"Now, little woman!" Danford bustled up, lugging the valise and flapping umbrella. Usually she would have helped him with one of them, but now she hung heavily on his arm, lagging behind.

"Tired out, Betty?" Then, glancing down into her face, "You've been having one of those old headaches. Did you see Dr. Thayer, as I told you?"

"No, no. Dr. Thayer cannot help me. Besides, I have no headache. Come; there is Nelly at the window."

There were fires in every room of the little house, the square windows glowed through the tracery of vines, and the wet trunks of the trees reflected the lights through the rain.

"See how pretty it is!" she said, stopping at the gate. "I told Charley to make an illumination. We won't think of expense—just for this night."

"That was right." Danford pushed on hurriedly. He felt a choking at his throat. They had worked so long for this home, and here it was at last—home.

Afterward, when he tried to remember the occurrences of the evening, knowing that life or death depended on his accuracy, he could recall little that was peculiar in his wife's conduct. She and the children [illegible] the house in a fever of delight and triumph. There was not a closet or cranny left unexplored. Charley acted as showman, baby clung to her mother as usual, old black Sally went before with the candle, the proudest of all. His wife said little, as was her habit, except when alone with him. He remembered how some boys came to the door to make plans for to-morrow's holiday with Charley, and how anxiously she asked who and what they were. "Why, it was only the other day," she said, with a quaver in her voice, "that Charley was a baby in my arms, and now he has his friends—his plans. He is going from us out into the world. And I have no hold on him—I have no hold on him!"

"Nonsense, Lizzy," Mr. Danford replied. "Never was a woman with as much influence over her children as you. We'll not let him leave Philadelphia until he's a man. The boy's safe enough when he can come home at night to such a mother as you."

He remembered that she suddenly quailed at this, and was silent, in a way which seemed strange to him at the time. When the boy came back, Danford was sitting by the fire, his wife on a low stool beside him, her head on his knee. She had some childish, undignified ways, which somehow made the boy and his father look on her as a chum and a jolly good fellow.

"Father," said Charley, with the self-assertion of 13, "I think that after this I shall go to meet you at the depot. It is hardly proper for mother to be out alone after dark."

"No harm will come to me, my son," she said, smiling.

"I don't want her to act as if she were a poor woman, sir, with nobody to look after her," he cried, hotly. "Ladies in fine houses don't go about alone, and mother is——"

"Mother has her fine house, too, and we two stout fellows will take care of her," laughed Danford. But his wife's head lay still upon his knee, and she did not laugh nor look up.

When the children were asleep he remembered that she began a strange talk, which he tried to check once or twice, of how her brothers (who were Kentuckians) had both gambled their property away.

"It's in the blood," she said. "If Charley should show any sign of it, you'll watch him, Richard, and be patient with him. A father ought to be as patient as God with his child."

Now Danford was apt to be irritable with the lad, and his mother always had stood between them. Before he could answer, however, she went on. "I know you'll bear with Nelly's faults; you understand women so well, Richard. Nobody could have borne with my folly as you did when we were first married."

"Are you so wise now, then?"

She laughed suddenly, and, drawing down his head, kissed him swiftly on both eyes, so as to shut them. She had always odd, unexpected ways of caressing him, which used to make the overworked little man feel himself fresh and young again.

"What do you talk in this way for to-night, Betty? Let us be happy, coming home the first night. There's no need too look into the future to find misery."

"No, there is no need. Maybe the misery will never come. God has always been so good to us!" The little joke seemed to have brought her by sudden reaction into her happy self again.

When she had gone to her room with Nelly, Danford opened his desk to put away the papers in his valise. He found it in thorough order, all business documents belonging to household affairs sorted and ticketed.

"The milk bill paid, and Nott— Betty has worked hard while I was gone. Mrs. Danford had some way of adding to their income—leather-work or banner painting, we forget which. Beside these bills which she had paid there were two or three rolls of smaller notes, labeled, "For Charley's clothes for the winter," "For Nelly's."

Danford laughed. His wife was usually the most unsystematic woman alive. But he went to his room in high good humor. She was standing by the crib, opening the little white petticoats which Nelly had taken off, and hanging them up to air.

"You have provided for the children all winter," he cried, holding out the rolls of notes.

She turned quickly. "Oh, they will not need it. I shall be here to earn plenty more for them, and for you—I shall be here, Richard." She took up the sleeping child and walked about with it, straining it to her breast. Danford took it from her gently, and laid it down. "How white and fat her feet are!" he said, quietly. "Cover them up warm, mother. Now come and sit down. You've been working too hard, my poor girl."

Danford took Charley with him into town the next day. They were to come out together in the evening. Before noon Mrs. Danford sent Sally (an old black servant, who had been a slave and her nurse in Kentucky) out on an errand which would detain her for an hour or two. Nelly was asleep in her crib. As the clock was on the stroke of 12, the bell rang, and she admitted the man she had met the night before. They were closeted together for an hour; then they came into the little parlor. The man, whose habitual manner to women savored of familiarity, was grave and awkwardly respectful; Mrs. Danford's face was bloodless. He poured out a glass of water, and gave it to her.

"You have overtaxed your strength in keeping your secret, madam. In a man we would call such reticence heroic; but I find it not uncommon with women. I think they are prompted to it by—vanity," a disagreeable smile lurking on his mouth.

She bowed courteously, but he knew she had not heard a word. "Be seated. Wait one moment, doctor; I have a question to ask of you."

Dr. Prey sat down uncomfortably. Eminent specialist as he was, and used to dealing out life and death, "practicing among the wealthiest classes" (vide card), he could not feel at ease with this woman, whose clothes and house, he had decided, could scarcely be called genteel. "She does not consider E. M. Prey a gentleman!" he blustered inwardly, struggling to act as though he stood on the same level with her.

"A question, eh? Really, now, my dear madam, better ask no questions at all. The wise patient leaves all details to his physician. You are exhausting nervous power—"

"You have not given my disease a name to me."

"You assuredly must have guessed it," roughly.

"Mrs. Danford looked quickly to the door, into the fire, as though in search of something. She did not speak for a moment. "Cancer?"

He nodded.

"Incurable?"

He hesitated. The fire crackled, the ashes fell on the fender. A little stir in the next room was heard in the silence. "Mamma!" cried Nelly.

"It is unusual for a patient to insist upon such questions. Measurably you take the case in your own hands."

She raised her hand with a quick gesture.

"If you will have it, then, I see no probability of cure. The case has peculiar features which I have met with in no other. All that can be done is to put yourself in my hands. I can alleviate your sufferings. My large experience," etc., etc.

He talked on until he observed that she did not hear him. Her eyes were fixed on the closed door behind which was her baby. When she spoke she did not look at him. "How long will it be?"

"About four months, probably. Certainly not more than that." He began to draw on his gloves briskly. There was no demand for sympathy, the woman took it so coolly.

"One moment. I have something more to ask." She had risen, and stood with her hands clasped over her head.

The doctor's eye swept over her. "She's had remarkable beauty in her day; but her day is over," he thought.

"Patients with this disease often— I have heard that it was loathsome, horrible beyond words. Shall I"— she stopped, swallowing once or twice.

Even in the man's vulgar face shone a sudden gleam of pity. But he was ashamed of it. "It is usually the case with patients in this disorder. I see no reason to hope that you will escape, Mrs. Danford."

"I thought so—I thought so," sharply. "Well, there is nothing to be done about it. Will you write me a general prescription—to alleviate pain, you said?"

"You do not wish me to attend you regularly, then?"—with a surprised glance.

"I may be removed out of your reach," she said, evasively.

When he had written the prescription and torn the leaf from his book, she handed him his fee, waited until he had left the house, and then went in to her baby.

When old Sally came in presently, she heard Nelly laughing and talking for an hour or more, and wondered that her mother made no sound in reply. Late in the afternoon a telegram came from Danford: "Will be detained at office until 10 p. m. Shall keep Charley until I go out."

Lizzy read it and laid it down. "That is better," she said. "If I saw them again, I could not go." For she had quite made up her mind now what she would do. Her husband, her children, should not see her horrible end.

The house, the children's clothes, were in perfect order. But she went from place to place with Nelly in her arms. It was singular that it was only of their practical loss when she was gone that she thought. "Sally can cook; but who will keep the house, or make their clothes in the spring? Charley will have nobody to tell his stories about school to when he comes home. And Richard—" But she forced that back.

She sat down and rocked the child, looking by turns at its little feet, its hands, pushing back its hair. She thought of her at every age—a school-girl—grown up.

"She will have no mother—no mother.' She had been a devout, prayerful woman, but she could not pray now. It seemed to her as if God did not know what He was doing when He did this thing.

She made herself up a bundle of clothes, fastened it in a shawl-strap, and laid a letter she had written on her husband's pillow. The evening had fallen cold and drizzling. She gave Nelly her supper, undressed and rocked her to sleep; then she laid her in her crib. Only yesterday she had been busy making a cover for the crib and Charley's bed. It was all over now. She would never do anything for them again—never again.

It was time now. She put on her hat and cloak, took up her bundle. There was a blotted exercise which Charley had left half finished that morning; she took that with her, and the stocking which Nelly had just worn, still warm, the crease in it which the little foot had made. Then she went to her husband's old chair, where he had sat every evening for years, and knelt down by it. Sally, in the kitchen, thought she heard a call, "Richard! Richard!" but all was still.

As Lizzy knelt there she did not pray. She meant to bid good-by to her husband, but she could not. Would he ever forget her? Would he marry again? These were her thoughts. There had been a certain Annie Ward, years ago, of whom Danford had made a friend.

Elizabeth sprang to her feet and walked straight to the glass. "I hope he will be happy. He ought to marry, for the children's sake," she said, over and over. "But he will not remember me as loathsome. Annie Ward's face does not compare with mine now."

This new sharp pang gave her sudden strength. She stayed alone with her child for a few moments, and then passed hastily out, stopping at the kitchen door. The old black woman was busy over the fire, singing a Methodist hymn.

"Goin' to de depot, Miss Betty? Got on yoh wraps?"—coming to the door.

Elizabeth put her hand on the skinny fingers. "Take care of the children for me, Sally."

"Sartin. Yoh'r not goin' fur?"—with a vague alarm.

But Elizabeth made no answer, and disappeared in the darkness.

The letter which Danford found on his return contained these words:

"I have an incurable disease. I have but a little while to live, and I will not stay to become an object of disgust and loathing to you and the children. Do not try to find me. You never can do it. My measures are too well taken. You shall know when I am dead."

There was not a word of affection or of farewell. She could not trust herself to that.

In these practical days, whatever a man's agony he acts promptly and practically. In a day Danford's friends had set all the machinery of advertising, telegraphing, detective agencies to work; but to no effect. They searched distant places first—the scenes of those old excursions of which she had talked so much, the homes of her schoolmates, the county in Kentucky from which she came.

"She would not go out of sight of me and the children," poor Danford insisted; but nobody heeded him. Dr. Prey, for reasons of his own, never made himself known in the matter, and Elizabeth had had not hinted her disorder to the old family physician. "He would tell Richard," she said. Simply because she had taken no measures of precaution, she had left no clue whatever.

Month after month passed. Danford was at work again at his desk. When work was over, he walked the streets until late at night. It seemed to him that every moment he would meet her or hear that she was dead. The horrible cruelty of her conduct to himself never occurred to him; it was only of her, dying alone, perhaps in want, that he thought. The police reported to him, from time to time, their superhuman efforts. But we all know to what these efforts usually amount in cases of disappearance.

Mrs. Danford knew the city was her best hiding-place. Nowhere could a human being sink as securely out of sight as in the monotonous blocks of Philadelphia, with their million of inhabitants. There was little that was distinctive about Lizzie. A thin, oldish-looking woman, who wore a cap and spectacles, lodged in a room over a baker's shop in Kensington, and earned a dollar or two a week by slop-work. She brushed against policemen every day. Sometimes at night, wrapped in a cloak, she carried a basket filled with with shoe-laces and pins to the depot, and sat in a dark corner until the passengers to Germantown had gone out. She usually fell asleep, when her sun-bonnet covered her face. Richard and Charley came to that depot once or twice. Danford saw the wan, white hand which held the basket, stopped, and then went on. Another night Charley asked her the price of something, but she made no answer.

After that she was not able to leave the house for weeks, until one night, feeling that the end was near, she took her basket, covered herself in a large cloak, and found her way out to the depot. She sat down outside in the dark shadow made by a freight-car, and waited for the trains. Danford was in the last. Some people stopped him close beside her. She could have touched him by putting out her hand.

It was her husband whose clothes brushed hers—the man whose head had rested on her bosom. With feverish swiftness the old days when he was her lover came back to her—all the romance, the passion of her life; she was a girl, beautiful, beloved; she heard that soft music again which sounds but once in a life. Then she was conscious of the horrible death whose grip was on her, of even the miserable cloak in which she was wrapped. It seemed to her cruel that when she was an outcast, her body given up to slow decay, Danford should be coming home from his work quietly, as though nothing had happened. He was dressed carefully, as usual; his whiskers neatly trimmed. Out of the car, too, stepped the very Annie Ward of whom she had thought so often lately. She stopped and shook hands with Richard.

When he went up to his own house, his wife followed him. He opened the door with his latch-key, went in and shut it, she standing opposite. The wind blew fiercely the snow and sleet full in her face. The shades were not down in his room. She saw him turn up the light and stoop over the crib. Then he walked across the floor with a little white-gowned figure in his arms.

"Nelly! Nelly!" cried her mother. She ran across the street; she raised her hand to beat upon the door, and then she turned quickly and went back to the depot, and so to town. A stout, gray-haired man followed her, entered the same car, left it as she did, and, a moment after she reached her room over the bakery, was knocking at the door. She opened it.

"Dr. Thayer!"

"Yes, Lizzy. Any fire? I'm half frozen"—bustling forward to the stove, so as not to look at her.

"You—you had no right to follow me"—standing at bay, her eyes blazing. "Oh, my God! why didn't you come sooner?" crouching on the floor beside him, sobbing over his hand like a hurt child.

He said nothing for a while, and then gave a chuckle. "I said all along that the way to find you was to keep Nelly in sight. How often have you seen her?"

"Every day when I could walk."

"Lizzy," the doctor said, turning sharply on her, "who told you your disease was incurable?"

"Dr. Prey."

"Damned quack! Now listen to me. I'm not going to betray your secret. I don't want you to die at home, an object of disgust to your husband. I can understand that feeling fully. But I do mean to know if there is a necessity for your dying at all."

"It's too late," said Lizzy.

Of course it was not too late, or this history would never have been written. Nobody has a right to give unwary readers a true bill of disease and death under cover of a story. Lizzy's disorder took another name, and disappeared slowly under the old doctor's care. After the pink began to creep into her cheeks again, one spring morning he took her home, and placed her in her chair by the fire, with Nelly in her arms, and there her two boys found her when they came home at night.

Shadwell, one of the partners in the Quaker firm which employs Danford, heard the current report of the affair, and was much scandalized by it. "It is eccentric conduct in a woman. I do not like eccentric women. I'll drop in there to-night and take a look at her. Better have no doubtful people connected with the house."

The old Quaker dropped in to Danford's little parlor several evenings after that; he talked with Richard. Lizzy was busy helping Charley with his lessons.

In the spring Danford received notice that the firm had given him a junior partnership.

"Thee has well deserved it & —," said Shadwell, meeting him that day. "If I were in thy place, Richard," he added, presently, "I would give thy wife a journey. She is not rugged, and thee can well afford it now. Thee has a remarkable woman for a wife, Richard."

Miss Annie Ward was another person who thought Mrs. Danford a remarkable woman. "What a lovely face she has," she used to say, heartily. "Her husband is such a plodding, commonplace little man, too. I wonder what she saw in him. The earthen and porcelain pitchers again."

But Lizzy held Miss Ward at freezing distance. "I know very well she had designs on you when I was gone, Richard," she says.

"Such folly, Betty!" he cries, angrily.

But, after all, it is her folly that he loves in Elizabeth, not her housekeeping abilities or good sense.

They have started now on their journey into Kentucky. They are in no whit different outwardly from the other middle-aged, commonplace folk crowding the cars, equipped with the inevitable linen duster and shawl-straps and sachels. But at heart they are very much like two children who set out to find the fairy pot of gold beneath the rainbow. They meet all the world coming this way, agog to see the Exposition; but they two go leisurely along, with their secret between them. Every trifle is an event, every chance meeting an adventure. They have left office and housekeeping and middle age behind them. It looks to other people like an ordinary railroad on which they travel, but they know that they are on their way to the enchanted land. And, as they come nearer to the quiet hills behind the setting sun where they first knew each other, they are sure that they will find youth and its love and freshness there again, and will bring it all home with them.—Harper's Monthly for April.

The Feat of a Crazy Gymnast.

"Senor Mirande," gymnast, eclipsed all his previous flights while delirious from fever at New York, the other evening. He had been so violent that he was tied to his bed, but he broke the cords, and, with a shriek, turned a somersault through the third-story window and hung to the casement by his hands, his body swinging to and fro forty feet above the sidewalk, while he shouted to his friends: "Go away! I'll climb to the moon!" Then he swayed his body with increasing rapidity and let go, but he grasped the metal leader of the house, went up it hand over hand with the agility of a monkey, and suddenly plunged forward, landing upon the top of a shutter on the top floor. He swung on the fragile blind, which it was feared would be forced from its hinges by his weight, and, suddenly leaping in the air, grasped the gutter of the adjoining house. Away he went leaping from shutter to window-sill, until the top of the stoop was reached, when he slid down one of the posts to the street, escaping in the darkness. He was finally caught, but died next day.

Five Thousand Books Given Away for the Asking.

While Dr. H. James was attached to the British Medican Staff in the East Indies, his high position enabled him to call about him the best chemists, physicians and scientists of the day, and while experimenting with and among the natives, he accidentally made the discovery that CONSUMPTION can be positively and permanently CURED. During the many years of his sojourn there, he devoted his time to the treatment of Lung Diseases, and upon his retirement he left with us books and papers containing full particulars, showing that every one can be his own physician and prepare his own medicine, and such information as we have received we now offer to the public without price, only asking that each remit a three-cent stamp for postage. For a Good Breakfast or Tea,

You have often to make rolls, biscuit and such delicacies, in about ten minutes. It's easy and certain with DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER, the best of them all. Troubled housewife, here is one cause of your annoyances swept away. Full weight and the best material are the watchword of the manufacturers.

Prof. Tyndall's Warning.

In concluding an address to the students of University College (London), Prof. Tyndall, who is unquestionably one of the most indefatigable brain-workers of our century, said, "take care of your health. Imagine Hercules as oarsman in a rotten boat; what can he do there but by the very force of his stroke expedite the ruin of his craft. Take care of the timbers of your boat." The distinguished scientist's advice is equally valuable to all workers. We are apt to devote all our energies to wielding the oars, our strokes fall firm and fast, but few of us examine or even think of the condition of our boats until the broken or rotten timbers suddenly give way and we find ourselves the victims of a calamity which could have been easily avoided by a little forethought. What began with a slight fracture, or perhaps even a careless exposure to disorganizing influences, ends in the complete wreck of the life-boat. The disease which began with a slight headache or undue exposure to cold terminates in death, unless its progress be checked, and the disease remedied. The first symptoms, the heralds of disease, give an indication of the strength of the on-coming foe, and the victim hopes that his old ally, Nature, will exterminate the invader. But disease is an old general and accomplishes his most important movements in the night time, and some bright morning finds him in possession of one of the strongest fortifications; and when he has once gained a stronghold in the system Nature ignominiously turns traitor and secretly delivers up the whole physical armory to the invader. Like the wily politician, Nature is always on the strongest side, and the only way to insure her support is to keep your vital powers in the ascendant. Keep your strongest forts—the stomach and liver—well guarded. Do not let the foe enter the arterial highways, for he will steal or destroy your richest merchandise and impoverish your kingdom. To repulse the attacks of the foe you can find no better ammunition than Dr. Pierce's Family Medicines. (Full directions accompany each package.) His Pleasant Purgative Pellets are especially effective in defending the stomach and liver. His Golden Medical Discovery for purifying the blood and arresting coughs and colds. If you wish to become familiar with the most approved system of defense in this warfare, and the history of the foe's method of invasion, together with complete instructions for keeping your forces in martial order in time of peace, you can find no better manual of these tactics than "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser," by R. V. Pierce, M. D., of the World's Dispensary, Buffalo, N. Y. Sent to any address on receipt of $1.50. It contains over nine hundred pages, illustrated by two hundred and eighty-two engravings and colored plates, and elegantly bound in cloth and gilt.

A Guinea is Scarce Yellower

Than the complexion of a person becomes who omits to regulate his liver when that important gland grows neglectful of its secretive function. Moreover, the stomach under such circumstances becomes disordered, the bowels are constricted, pains in the side and between the shoulder blades are felt, the head aches, and [illegible] to the general derangement. This concatenation of evils is, however, easily remediable with that matchless regulating tonic, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which insures the secretion and flow of healthy bile, acts gently but effectually upon the bowels, and removes every symptom of nervous or digestive trouble. The result is that renewed tone is given to the entire system; the sallow, haggard appearance of the face to which biliousness gives rise is superseded by the glow of health, and the frame gains in substance as well as vigor.

The National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America.

In marked contrast with the unpleasant developments that have appeared recently, concerning certain companies, we are glad to note the results of an official examination of this Company. Although having a charter direct from Congress, it does not attempt to disavow its responsibility to State insurance laws.

By mutual agreement, on behalf of the State Departments of New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and Michigan, the Hon. Samuel H. Rowe, of the latter State, commenced on January 8th a rigid examination of the books, assets and liabilities of this Company. Commissioner Rowe was assisted by Prof. Watson, the well-known Actuary, and V. H. Lott, Esq.

The detailed examination continued without interruption until the 10th of February. The results are highly gratifying to the friends of the Company and the public generally. On the 14th instant the Company received from Commissioner Rowe a renewal of its authority to do business in Michigan, together with his written assurance that he found the Company able to comply fully with the stringent laws of his State. The entire reserve is invested in United States bonds and first mortgages. On the 31st of December, 1876, it had a grand surplus above all liabilities of $1,416,[illegible]. Its receipts in 1876 exceeded its disbursements by over $[illegible], although it paid in death claims nearly a quarter of a million dollars. More perfect security could not be offered to insurers. It is almost unnecessary to say that this Company has nothing to do with the National Capital Life Insurance Company of the District of Columbia. Unlike the latter company, the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America is not reinsuring other companies, and is not responsible in any way for the liabilities or policies of the Republic Life Insurance Company or any other corporation.

When He was a Boy.

In an article on "The Historic Buildings of America," in Potter's American Monthly for June, Dr. Lossing tells a delightful anecdote, introducing us to the early boyhood of Washington and his friend, Richard Henry Lee. The anecdote is told in connection with an account of Stratford House, the family seat of the Lee family, and is as follows:

It [Stratford House] is only a mile from the birth-place of Washington, and stood in the midst of a highly-cultivated country, dotted with the mansions of people who formed a very refined society. There Washington and Richard Henry Lee undoubtedly often played together, and [illegible] between the dwellings was the scene of the following correspondence when they were boys only 9 years old, there being only a few weeks difference between their ages. Little Lee wrote:

Pa brought me two pretty books full of pictures he got them in Alexandria they have pictures of dogs and cats and tigers and elefants and ever so many pretty things cousin bids me send you one of them it has a picture of an elefant and a little indian boy on his back like uncle jo's sam pa says if I learn my tasks good he will let uncle jo bring me to see you will you ask your ma to let you come to see me.

RICHARD HENRY LEE.

To this note little Washington replied:

DEAR DICKEY—I thank you very much for the pretty picture book you gave me. Sam asked me to show him the pictures and I showed him all the pictures in it; and I read to him how the tame elephant took care of the master's little boy, and put him on his back and would not let anybody touch his master's son. I can read three or four pages sometimes without missing a word. Ma says I may go to see you and stay all day with you if it be not rainy. She says I may ride my pony Hero if Uncle Ben will go with me and lead Hero. I have a little piece of poetry about the picture book you gave me, but I mustn't tell you who wrote the poetry:

G. W.'s compliments to R. H. L.
And likes his book full well,
Henceforth will count his friend,
And hopes many happy days he may spend.

Your good friend,
GEORGE WASHINGTON.

This poetry was written, it is said, by Mr. Howard, a gentleman who used to visit at the house of Mrs. Washington.

Our Reserve Army.

Statistics just published in regard to the militia force of the United States show the following interesting facts: There are attached to the militia 115 general officers, 895 regimental officers, and 4,356 company officers. Total number of commissioned officers, 6,541. Non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates, 88,826. The total number of men available for military service, but at present unorganized, is 2,875,460—apportioned as follows: Maine, 78,376; New Hampshire, 36,394; Vermont, 30,112; Massachusetts, 247,495; Rhode Island, 40,839; Connecticut, 61,302; New York, 483,183; New Jersey, 134,257; Pennsylvania, 356,398; Delaware, not reported; Maryland, 88,244; Virginia, West Virginia and North Carolina, not reported; South Carolina, 79,040; Georgia, Florida and Alabama, not reported; Mississippi, 135,178; Louisiana, 118,209; Texas, 76,458; Arkansas, 95,195; Kentucky, 217,044; Tennessee, not reported; Ohio, 229,725; Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, Wisconsin and Minnesota, not reported; Iowa, 169,118; Nebraska, 46,000; Kansas 90,000; Nevada and Oregon, not reported; California, 101,937. A rough calculation of the military available in the omitted States, based on the proportion of availables to population in the other States, gives them nearly 1,500,000, so that the military strength of the nation on paper is in round numbers 4,375,460 men.

Death of a Promising Young Lady.

Chicago papers record the death of Miss Alta M. Hulett, the well-known female lawyer of that city. Her death occurred in San Diego, Cal., whither she fled in November from consumption, which attacked her early last fall; but her enemy followed her. Miss Hulett was in her 23d year at the time of her death. She was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court in June, 1873. She had the sincere respect and esteem of all with whom she came in contact. Her business grew rapidly, and her prospects were very bright. Her ability was unquestioned, and in addition to her law practice she was in the habit of lecturing on various subjects. She had considerable practice in the courts, and had the respect of the bench and bar without exception. She had many excellences of character, and was personally beloved by all who knew her. In the death of Miss Hulett the legal profession loses a member whose promise was remarkable, and the question of woman's success in arduous professional careers becomes more serious. Over-work, sanguine but honorable ambition, and a recklessness of health have closed an outlook as encouraging for the sex as it was brilliant for the individual.

A Manufactory of Cripples.

A manufactory of cripples for begging has been unearthed in Hungary. It seems that, twenty years ago, a man named Trouilleson, his mistress and her brother came to Radna and started this establishment, amassing a large fortune out of the horrid trade. Children were kidnapped from all the surrounding cities, brought to Radna and placed in the hands of the mutilators, and thus were procured the horribly disfigured beggars for which the city has been noted. A medical professor of Prague discovered the place and notified the police, and the result was the arrest of the proprietors and disclosures which have horrified all Austria. In a filthy hall, as the officers entered, were huddled 100 wretches, legless, armless, blind, distorted; in hospital were three children, just recovering from amputations of hands or feet, while in a pit beneath the torture-chamber were putrefying human limbs. That the existence of this den was not unknown to the authorities is shown by the fact that the Mayor and two other officials have been arrested for accepting bribes to keep the matter secret; while the infuriated people can hardly be restrained from anticipating on the criminals the tardy justice of the guillotine.

The Profit of Cotton-Raising.

The Financial Chronicle has an article on the cost of cotton production. It believes the turning-point has come to that interest, and that the results of the year prove that cotton can be raised profitably in the Southern States at present prices. It cites the experience of a planter in Southwestern Georgia who ran his plantation by an overseer—of course the most expensive way. He raised 32,175 pounds, which netted him $7,828.50. The total cost of the crop was $5,413, leaving him a profit of $2,515.50. Had the crop been sold later it would have realized about $1,000 more. If he had lived with his family on the plantation, and done his own overseeing, the profit could easily have been doubled.

A CORRESPONDENT relates in a paper at St. Helena, Cal., a story of a wonderful dog in Pope valley. The owner kept sheep, and the dog herded them. Finally the sheep were sold to a Berryessa man (an adjacent valley some ten miles away). The owner and the dog delivered the sheep and returned home. Soon after the man missed his dog, and searched for him in vain. He was a valuable dog, and his loss was duly mourned for a couple of days, when, behold, up he came from Berryessa with the whole band of sheep, which he had brought safely home again.

THEY have been experimenting in California in raising hogs upon grapes. Mr. Joseph P. Dow publishes in the Russian River Flag an account of his experience in feeding a single porker. He turned the animal into his vineyard with a weight of 160 pounds, and it remained there twenty-seven days, having nothing to eat during that time except the finest grapes, such as Flame, Tokay, Black Hamburg and Muscat. It was then slaughtered and weighed 163 pounds net, equal to 203 pounds gross, showing a gain of forty-three pounds, or one and a half pounds per day.

JOHN NATHAN, a negro, was killed in St. Louis by a man whom he was assailing with a knife. On Nathan's body was found eleven scars, nearly all from stabs received in street fights; and he had inflicted, it is said, many more wounds than he had received. Another noteworthy thing about him was his belief in the efficacy of charms. In his pockets were found two potatoes, to ward off disease; a rabbit's foot, which he held in his hand "for luck" in throwing dice; an herb, to enable him to choose winning numbers in policy playing, and a peculiar shell to drive away evil spirits.

An [illegible] Case.

The Memphis (Tenn.) Appeal relates the following in its account of the recent burning of the steamer Gov. Garland in the Arkansas river: "Capt. Nowland's conduct was heroic. Finding it impossible to rescue his wife and two children, he was compelled to forsake either the former or the latter. He had no time to hesitate, for the flames were already scorching the passengers. Capt. Nowland kissed his little children farewell, and, seizing his wife, plunged into the water. He looked back, but the little children he could not see, for his eyes filled with tears, such as only a father or mother can know the meaning of. A deck-hand, named Billy Staples, whose home is in Memphis, witnessed the sad farewell. Seizing both of the children in his strong arms, the brave man leaped into the water and carried them safely to the shore."

IT CAN BE CURED.
IT can be [illegible]. There is no doubt about it. The immediate relief afforded by SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE FOR CATARRH is but a slight evidence of what may follow a persistent use of this remedy. The hard, incrusted matter that has lodged in the nasal passages is removed with a few applications; the ulceration and inflammation subdued and healed; the entire membranous lining of the head are cleansed and purified. Constitutionally its action is that of a powerful purifying agent, destroying in its course through the system [illegible] catarrhal disease.

Each package contains Dr. Sanford's Improved Inhaling Tube, with full directions for use [illegible] Price, $1.00. For sale by all wholesale and retail druggists throughout the United States. WEEKS & POTTER, General Agents and Wholesale Druggists, Boston.

J. R. LANNING.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA, APR. 12, 1877.

NEIGHBORHOOD NEWS.

AUBURN, JUNCTION.

Business on the decline.

The high water is abating.

Episode of the masculine persuasion at C. Clark's.

There was church services at the school house last Friday night. Mr. Moses, of Auburn, presiding.

We are sorry to chronicle the illness of Mrs. Geo. Clark.

We are making preparations to have a Sabbath school at the Junction, during the coming summer. All those interested in the Sabbath school cause should attend a meeting which will be held at the school house for this purpose next Friday evening.

We understand ground has been purchased from Mr. Fluke, just west of the Junction for the building of a brewery. There is no better location in Northern Indiana for a manufactory of this kind than at the Junction. It being a good shipping point, nothing can prevent it from being a success.

Mr. Shipley, commanding engineer of the B. & O. R. R., while cleaning out the [illegible] at the bridge across Cedar Creek, lost his pocket book in the water with twenty-seven dollars and some cents, and some very valuable papers in it. Mr. Shipley says the finder can have the money if they will return the papers to him. Any person finding the above pocket book will receive their reward by leaving the same with Mr. Pratt at the Junction.

GARRETT.

Beautiful spring has come at last.

Farmers are bringing in their maple syrup which is very good this spring.

Business is improving very rapidly. The merchants that were looking 'blue' all winter, are now going around with a glad smile on their faces, over the prospects of a good summer's trade.

Our school marms returned last Sunday looking very much refreshed after a short vacation. Mr. Will. Baker fills the vacancy made by Miss Collar in the intermediate department.

Chris. Knecht, former manager of the DeKalb House, has returned to Dayton, Ohio. We were sorry to see Chris. leave us as he was first-class citizen and highly respected by all who knew him. Tom Taggart is now manager of the hotel. Tom. is a genial, clever fellow, and an experienced hotel man.

Garrett is organizing a base ball club which we think will carry off the medal before the season ends.

W. L. Penfield, of Auburn, gained for himself quite a reputation in Garrett, through a couple of cases he tried here last week. We think Mr. P deserves credit for his legal ability, and we would be glad to have him locate here.

Mr. Murphy got up a masquerade ball here last week.

A loafer and dead beat, of this place, struck a new feature. He has got to dedicating dance houses to houses of illfame. Boot blacks get twenty-five cents for not squealing.

Several new buildings are now under construction with a fair prospect of a large number more during the coming summer, as the B. & O. company are going on with the balance of the buildings that were contemplated when the town was laid out, it encourages others to make improvements, and from this point we look for better times in Garrett this year than we have ever seen before. A large flouring mill, and an elevator will be erected here this summer; two things which are indispensable in a town like this. M. M.

CEDAR CREEK.

[Our genial and clever friend, J. B. Ness, Esq., sends us the following item from the above point. We should be pleased to hear often from J. B.]

The Auburn Courier gives the best statisfaction at this place. It has the largest circulation here of any paper in the country.

The Methodists, near our place, have had over twenty accessions to their church, as a result of a revival this last winter.

Our literary society has gone where the woodbine twineth. It died without a struggle. Payne said at his death, "I take a leap in the dark." So did the literary.

We had a large turn out at our school meeting to select a teacher. Satan came also, and we had a rousing time. No teacher chosen.

We want a minister to come and preach to us this summer. We want him to preach the loudest by example without using slang and telling yarns. We are good at that ourselves.

John Harvey, Esq., is doing a good work in the matrimonial business. He gave Dr. Shephard a Slice, and he is now a happy man. Who next.

BUTLER.

Farmers are energetically beginning their spring work.

The protracted meeting at the Disciple church commenced on last Sabbath evening. Rev. T. D. Sutton, the pastor is serving his congregation here for the fifth year. The Rev. Mr. Heuryx, of Remington, Ind., will assist him in the meeting after thirteenth inst.

The salary of Rev. Mr. Morris ought to be increased correspondingly with the increase of—It is a girl this time.

The red ribbonites are about to take the city for temperance.

The wife of Rev. S. Bacon still continues to grow weaker, and no hopes are entertained of her recovery. She is liable to exchange worlds any moment.

Weamer, of the Republican, came to Butler last week without his cane, his face was as long as a clothes line. With trembling steps, he went from office to office, and store to store, his face all the time wearing the same solemn look, impressing one that he was in search of a mourner's bench; to all he presented the same heartrending wail of woe—Bacon and his cruel pen—To one he said, "Not for any consideration would I have had my character exposed in Auburn." Said he "throughout the entire town I am shamefully disgraced, and I shall suffer irreparable loss as the consequence." More anon.

S. BACON.

NEWVILLE.

Martin Engle is the owner of a female hog, whose fecundity is remarkable. Appreciating the great demand for hogs owing to the fatal spread of the disease last fall, she contributed a litter of eight spotted pigs, and four days after went one better, making a total of seventeen.

Wilson Countryman has purchased a half interest in the steam mill of Moody & Gunsenhouser.

A Steephen intends opening out a new drug store, and expects a fresh supply of drugs in a few days.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

The First National Bank of Auburn Indiana tenders to the citizens of DeKalb county its facilities for the transaction of business. We loan money, receive deposits subject to check at sight or payable at a fixed date with a stipulated rate of interest. Sell exchange on New York, Chicago, Toledo and Fort Wayne procure such foreign exchange as may be desired, buy exchange and make collections on all available points, and do all usual and ordinary business done by first class banks. We will also take on deposit for safekeeping valuable papers such as deeds mortgages, notes bonds, agreements etc., guardians, administrators, trustees and all other handling trust funds together with merchants, manufacturers and farmers are solicited to open an account with us. We will deal liberally with all who call.

FRUIT HOUSE PRICES.

No dull times with us---Our trade continually on he increase.

No secret about it, simply purchasing our goods in large quantities of first hands and selling direct to our customers at a small profit, thereby saving them the profits of the middle men which adds 15 to 20 per cent.; even forty per cent on some goods. This saving we are bound to give to our customers.

Take tea for instance: The advance on that article from the time it arraves in New and is sold to the speculator, and from him to the jobber, and from the jobber to the wholesale grocer, and from the wholesale grocer to the retail dealer, is at least 30 per cent. As each of these dealers has to make his 5 to 10 per cent. on the sale, and then the retailer, he must have his profit, and by the time is reaches the consumer there is at least 50 per cent added to it. We cut all these off by ordering direct from the importer and selling direct to the consumer. When we first commenced our trade was two chests a month and now it is as many chests a day. So with all other goods, Sugars, Coffees, Tobaccoes, Fish, Spice or anything we deal in, we purchase at the first hands and resell direct to the consumer and save the profits of the middle dealers.

Prof. Morse, Principal of the Indiana Conservatory of Music at Fort Wayne, gave us a call last Monday. The Professor will come to Auburn one day in each week and give hour lessons at a much less rate than it will cost to go to Wayne, providing he can secure six or eight scholars.

We feel like returning thanks to our many farmer friends who have been so zealous in supplying our town cows with a good article of hay from their wagons during the past winter. The t. c. are looking splendid. Some improvement can be made by lowering the heighth of their wagon beds, so that these cheeky bovines can have easier access to their contents.

Mr. Welch, authorizes us to enter his protest against a number of citizens of this place, for unceremouniously and surreptitiously entering the parsonage, on last Saturday night, and there without form of law or license unmercifully "pounding" his lady. A much more exemplary show of conduct was expected considering those who were engaged in the affair. But such is life. It was another of those little spots of green that make life pleasant, and encourage us to the good work.

The following appointments were made for the M. E. Conference, at Bluffton, last week:

Waterloo, W. H. Daniel.

The citizens of this place will find interesting reading matter in another column, in the shape of an ordinance requiring hogs to be kept up. We hope to see it enforced, and our side walks and grass plots protected. While they are good scavangers, they do a great deal of injury. Then there is a fellow in the south part of town, who has made several fortunes by pasturing his hogs on the town. His first name is Tom, and we are keeping our eye on him.

The M. E. Sunday School.

This School was reorganized on last Sunday April 8th by the unanimous reelection of the officers of last year viz. W. L. Meese Supt. Mrs. A. E. Robbins assistant Supt. Miss Josie Rush, Secy. John Weaver Treas. Miss Abbie Potter and Bell Lanning, Librarians. M. F. Long, Choruster and Miss May Lewis, Organist. Misses Bell Stahl, Eliza Stahl and Rosa Shaffer were chosen assistants in the work of the School. George Zimmerman and Albert Case, were chosen as Artists to prepare the blackboard exercise. The School has been during the past year, in a highly prosperous and interesting condition and we hope will grow in interest and influence during the coming year.

SAD EVENT.

Mr. Calvin Fair, a son of David Fair, formerly of this county, came home from the west a few weeks ago, where he had resided for six years past. A few days ago he was noticed acting strange, and last Sunday evening he became unmanageable, under an aberration of mind, so that it required several of his relatives to keep him under control. He was finally placed in jail to prevent him from doing injury. He is a fine looking man, of splendid physique, only about twenty-eight years old. It is feared he is helplessly insane. It a sad fate for one so young and promising, and it is to be hoped that the infliction will prove only a temporary one.

Merton, we understand, had an invitation to go south and see things as they are, and not remain at home feeding himself on a morbid imagination—blood and hate. He wouldn't go. He don't want to see things as they are. When he does, and tells his party the truth regarding them, then, indeed, is his "occupation gone." There may be some more capital to be made out of the "bloody shirt," but we do not believe it.

We have at last been convinced of the truthfulness of the beautiful scriptural passage. "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and in many days it will return to you." Forty years ago Dick Thompson, of this State, made a speech at Columbus, to which Mr. Hayes listened, and was pleased. When Hayes became President he made Dick Secy. of the Navy on the strength of that speech. Public speakers should make a note of this. They do not know but than a President in embryo may be listening.

There is some little distrust felt by those parties who bought cheap imported buggies at auction here a few months ago. It is always better and cheaper in the long run to patronize your neighbor, men whom you would ask a favor if you needed it. Patronize yourselves, properly speaking We know home-made buggies that have been run in this city for three years, that will yet our wear the greater number of the new ones brought here from distant manufacturers.

Life will be a blank now to Charley Foster, since the "Indianian" has taken to speak unkindly of him. In speaking of Ohio, it says that there is a sly notion that her Stanley Mathews and her Fosters have placed the party and Mr. Hayes in a very unpleasant attitude." Well we symphathize with Hayes, that he should be placed in an unpleasant attitude by such men as Charley Foster. Poor Hayes, he is not showing up that greatness of character, which the late campaign assigned him.

Ex-Gov. Hendricks is down in a gold mine in the Rocky Mountains. He wants to get out of sight. It will be remembered that he once run for Vice-President.—Standard.

Yes and it will be remembered that a quarter of a million of a majority of the voters of the whole country, voted him Vice President, and that he was afterwards cheated, defrauded and swindled out of the position to which he was legally elected, and that another man occupies his place through fraud. These things will be remembered, in connection with the fact of his candidacy.

If we can't have a first-class poet, we can brag on our theatrical talent. The Garrett News, of last week, speaking of the dramatic entertainment given there a few days ago, says: "John Knoder, of Auburn, played Terence O'More to the satisfaction of the entire audience. His was a very difficult part to perform and he sustained it well. His fight with the grave diggers and Benard Kavanagh was timely, and had good effect upon the house, while his bidding goodbye to Kathleen, Father O'Cassidy and the jailer, in the prison, was splendid. Mr. Knoder is a fine actor, and any play he takes part in will be a success."

Almost Fatally Drowned,

We drove down to the creek the other day with the world renowned speed horse, White Stocking, and seing several little ponds of nice blue water by the roadside, we thought we would wash the mud from the wagon by driving through them. After passing through two we entered the third with high hope and placid temper, when all at once the little horse disappeared, and all we could see was the lines coming out of the water. We thought at first that he had grown tired of life and wanted to be a meremaid, but suddenly he popped up again, and down we went waist deep. We are glad, however, that we can say we were perfectly cool under the circumstances, the water being at freezing point. Then Tom Cool came along and that made it more so. We were at last aroused from our reverie, by a yell of laughter, and we finally succeeded in saving ourself and the horse, but the wagon came very near being drowned. We had struck a wash out about ten feet deep. Moral, beware of appearances.

It is said our friend Grant is poor, owing to several speculations in water lots. We noticed he looked sad when he laid down a quarter for two dr— cigars, in the restaurant just before the train left. They are 15 cents apiece or two for a quarter, in that immoral atmosphere.

LIMERICK, ILL., April 6th, 1877.

DEAR BROTHER:—I presume you are anxious to know the results of my trip to Mississippi. We left home for the south on Monday, March 12th. The snow was falling rapidly as we passed Mendota, but when we reached Centralia it was all out of sight. At Cairo we found pleasant weather though it had been stormy. We left Cairo Wednesday morning at one o'clock, having been detained at Centralia, and this point about 20 hours. This made the trip longer than we expected, and was the result of taking the wrong train in the start. We reached our point of destination on Wednesday night at 11 P. M. The point was Hazelhurst, the county seat of Copiah county Miss., 35 miles south of Jackson, the State Capital, 180 miles north of New Orleans, 400 due south of Cairo and 44 miles north of McComb city, our point of visitation last spring. The next day after our arrival the carriage of a Mr. Redus drove up to the hotel for us, and we accompanied him to his residence some four miles distant. Mr. Redus is what you might call a southern yankee. Born in Alabama and raised in Mississippi, he has managed in spite of the ill fortunes of war to make himself independent, and to-day is one of the few native southerners who can make money and grow rich without slave labor. He owns about 1,000 acres of land and a first class Saw mill and planing mill, corn grinder attached. His lumber undressed brings $10.00 at the R. R., flooring $18.00. He clears $1.00 per cord on his wood, selling for $2.50, costing him $1.00 for cutting and 50c for hauling. He has quite a comfotable dwelling, 2,000 bearing peach trees with a variety of the fruits. He unfortunately is lame and his business crowds him too much so he offers his land, Saw mill and all for sale cheap. His mill, wagons etc., with 180 acres of good saw timber land can be bought for $5,000, one third cash, balance on time at 8 per cent. interest. His house, orchard and 700 acres, the greater part of which could be soon brought under cultivation he offers for $7,000—less than $10.00 per acre. The land is what would be called in Indiana good and, the soil is a loamy clay with enough sand to make it work easily. Fresh lands will produce about 300 lbs. lint cotton per acre, worth from 10 to 12 cents per pound, of corn it will produce from 20 to 40 bushels, worth from 75c to $1.00 per bushel, but it is the paradise of fruit; peaches, pears, apples, figs, strawberries, blackberries, raspberries, plums, grapes, pomegranates and so on "ad infinitum." Two crops of Irish potatoes can be produced in a year and the very best of sweet potatoes, Louisiana and sorghum sugar cane, the former producing from 250 to 300 gallons molasses per acre, and the latter a far superior article to that produced in the north. On all this tract are numberless springs of pure, clear soft water, making it excellent for dairy purposes. I have secured a deed for 80 acres of land lying on both sides of the R. R. I have a series of gently sloping hills on the south part of my land on which I intend to try and secure a cluster of cottages of norther people where we can have post office, school, church and society. I propose to the first five persons of good moral character who may apply, a lot of one or two acres each on the condition that within two years thereon a residence worth $1,000. After that I will sell lots cheap. I intend to make this my future home. I have given the place the name of "Dell Springs." It is 240 miles north of New Orleans a little south of the 32nd paralell of latitude, 4 miles south of Hazelhurst the county seat and seven miles from Wesson, the site of the Mississippi Cotton mills which run 10,000 spindles and employ 800 operatives; there is also a celebrated watering place five miles west where hundreds of people spend their summers. The people are organizing to secure emigration, and the country is begining to attract attention. First, farms are being bought with every prospect of renumerative returns. The Illinois Central R. R., now controls the entire line from there to Chicago and offers encouragement in the reduction of rates. At Chrystal springs one station north and in the same county, fruit farms can scarcelly be bought at any price, as the owners have found out the value of their lands, and have no desire to sell. Several kinds of manufactures could with advantage be started here. There is the finest white oak, hickory, ash and other hard woods convienient. Sheep growing pays large profits. A citizen stated to me that his flock realized to him in profits 50 per cent. As to health it is far ahead of DeKalb county. Malarial diseases are rare. Rheumatism yields to the acquable temperature, and for lung and throat diseases there is healing in the air.

Yours affectionately,

A. H. WIDNEY.

THE NEWS CONDENSED.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE ORDER FOR THE WITHDRAWAL OF THE TROOPS.

The following letter has been made public by the President:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, April 3, 1877.

SIR: Prior to my entering upon the duties of the Presidency, there had been stationed, by the order of my predecessor, in the State House at Columbia, S. C., a detachment of United States infantry. Finding them in that place, I have thought proper to delay a decision of the question of their removal until I could consider and determine whether the condition of affairs in that State is now such as to either require or justify the continued military occupation of the State House. In my opinion there does not now exist in that State such domestic violence as is contemplated by the constitution as the ground upon which the military power of the national Government may be invoked for the defense of the State. There are, it is true, grave and serious disputes as to the rights of certain claimants to the chief executive office of that State, but these are to be settled and determined, not by the Executive of the United States, but by such orderly and peaceful methods as may be provided by the constitution and laws of the State. I feel assured that no resort to violence is contemplated in any quarter, but that, on the contrary, the disputes in question are to be settled solely by such peaceful remedies as the constitution and laws of the State provide.

Under these circumstances, and in this confidence, I now deem it proper to take action in accordance with the principles announced when I entered upon the duties of the Presidency. You are, therefore, directed to see that the proper orders are issued for the removal of said troops from the State House to their previous place of encampment.

(Signed), R. B. HAYES.

To the Hon. George W. McCrary, Secretary of War.

The following letter was sent to Gen. Sherman by the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, April 3, 1877.

To Gen. W. T. Sherman, Commanding United States Army:

GENERAL: I inclose herewith a copy of a communication from the President of the United States, in which he directs that the detachment of United States troops now stationed in the State House at Columbia, S. C., be withdrawn and returned to their previous barracks or camping-ground. You are hereby charged with the execution of this order, and will cause their withdrawal to take place on Tuesday next, the 10th of April, at 12 meridian. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE W. MCCRARY, Secretary of War.

HAMPTON TO THE PRESIDENT.

Wade Hampton, before the above order was issued, gave the President a written pledge that there should be no resort to violence to assert his claims to the Governorship, but that he would proceed against Chamberlain in a peaceful and legal manner, and that he would see to it that every citizen, white and black, would receive full and equal protection in the enjoyment of all his rights under the constitution of the United States.

THE EAST.

THE complete count of the vote cast at the recent election in New Hampshire shows that the amendment to the State constitution abolishing the religious test for office-holders has been adopted by a small majority, and hereafter Catholics will be eligible to office in that State.

DOUGHERTY BROS. & Co., bankers in Pittsburgh, Pa., have failed for $110,000.... Bertha Von Hillern, the female pedestrian, has succeeded, at Boston, in walking fifty miles in less than twelve hours.... Mrs. Peter Burns and her four children were recently burned to death at Rhinebeck, N. Y., by the burning of the family residence.

FIVE members of the New York Legislature are said to have received $250,000 for their help in passing the infamous Tweed charter, which placed the treasury of New York city entirely at the mercy of the Tammany thieves. The evidence of this bribery is understood to be in existence, but its custodians, the Harpers' of New York city, are suppressing it, with the purpose of negotiating for the return of the money to the State.

A MOST diabolical crime was perpetrated in New York city a few days ago. Orville D. Jewett, a junior member of the firm of Jewett & Co., white lead manufacturers, went to the office of the firm armed with a hand grenade, a pistol and a dirk, for the ostensible purpose of having a settlement preparatory to his withdrawal from the house. Some angry words passed between him and his uncle, George W. Jewett, the head of the firm, and he pulled the grenade from his pocket and threw it on the floor. An explosion followed. The uncle was killed, his own legs broken, and he received three terrible wounds in the abdomen. He then drew the pistol and attempted to shoot himself through the head, but his aim was ineffective. Young Jewett died the same evening. It is said he was crazed by liquor. Two other persons were injured by the explosion.

THE WEST.

TWO LITTLE daughters of Max Limpsey, a farmer, living near Milwaukee, were left by the parents in the kitchen, and, wood catching fire, the children were smothered and dead when found a short time afterward.

MORE than one-half of the business portion of Monroeville, Ohio, has been destroyed by fire. The losses aggregate $75,000.

ADVICES from the West report that Spotted Tail is on his way back to the Indian agencies, accompanied by Crazy Horse and his entire force of 900 followers. These savages and their hitherto implacable leader have agreed to surrender and accept the Government's terms of peace. The only hostile band of any consequence remaining is that of Sitting Bull, consisting of not more than 300 or 400 Indians—a force which the troops already in the field will probably be able to take care of.

EIGHT Winnebago Indians were drowned in the Missouri river, near Dakota City, a few days ago. Four of them were on an island hunting, and high water floated off their boat, and four others who went to their assistance were swamped in the floating ice.... A dispatch from Sioux City, Iowa, last week, says: "Emigration to the Black Hills has commenced in earnest, and, instead of coming in small squads, as has been the case the past month, they are now arriving in train-loads."

WASHINGTON.

JOAQUIN MILLER, the "Poet of the Sierras," is an applicant for the London Consulship.... Gov. Beveridge wants to be appointed Collector at Chicago.... Rear Admiral Worden has been retired from the navy at his own request.

A WASHINGTON dispatch of the 2d inst. says: "The most important action of the Cabinet on Saturday was taken upon the South Carolina case. This was a virtual agreement that the troops shall be withdrawn from the State House, but left in their barracks in Columbia for the purpose of maintaining order in case of disturbance. The administration is doing nothing but what is absolutely forced upon it. Negotiations are constantly going on. Mr. Chamberlain has submitted a new proposition, which he thinks will suit every one. It is that a commission shall be selected by the two sides, to be composed of five members, each side to select two, and they to select a fifth."

A WASHINGTON dispatch of the 3d inst. says: "The Cabinet, by a formal vote yesterday decided to instruct the Secretary of War to prepare an order for the withdrawal of the United States troops now on duty in the State House at Columbia, S. C. The actual vote in the Cabinet has not been disclosed, but it is understood to have been substantially unanimous, if not entirely so. The troops will not be actually transferred to their barracks until after the return of Govs. Chamberlain and Hampton to South Carolina, the delay being allowed in accordance with the wishes of both these gentlemen. Chamberlain has addressed a long letter to the President, protesting against the recall of the troops. He says: 'It will lead to the quick consummation of a political outrage against which I have felt and now feel it to be my solemn duty to struggle and protest so long as the faintest hope of success can be seen.'.... The President, in conversation the other day, in speaking of the many invitations he had received to go to Long Branch, said that he should remain in Washington the greater part of the summer.

SECRETARY SCHURZ says he will be in no hurry to make appointments in his department, but will take his time, so that he may be sure of getting the best men for the various positions. .... The various departments are crowded with applicants for office.... Appointments by the President: Armsted M. Swope, Collector of Internal Revenue in the Seventh District of Kentucky; James H. Mills, of Montana, Secretary of the Territory of Montana; F. C. Humphreys, Collector of Customs at Pensacola, Fla.; Edwin A. Howard, of Michigan, Agent for the Ponca Indians in Dakota; J. A. Warder, United States Attorney for the Middle District of Tennessee.

SECRETARY SCHURZ has promulgated an order providing for the investigation and determination of questions connected with appointments, removals and promotions in the various bureaus of his department, by means of a board of inquiry, comprising three members.

THE SOUTH.

REVENUE AGENT WAGNER telegraphs to Washington from Greensboro, N. C., that Collector Patterson, of that State, and Deputy Marshal Ray, with six men, raided illicit distillers in Watauga county, were fired upon, and two men of the posse killed, and Patterson wounded.

A NEW ORLEANS telegram states that two members of the Packard House of Representatives have seceded and joined their fortunes with the Nicholls Legislature. Another has resigned his seat. This proceeding, it is claimed, gives the Nicholls Legislature a quorum.... A Charleston (S. C.) telegram says: "The news of the determination of the Cabinet to withdraw troops from the State House in Columbia causes unbounded joy here. Telegrams from various points in the interior of the State say the news is received with impromptu meetings, salutes of cannon, and other demonstrations of popular rejoicing."

A FAMILY, supposed to be the notorious Benders, of Labette county, Kan., has been arrested in Arkansas by Kansas detectives.... The postoffice at Jacksonville, Fla., has been burned.... A paper mill at Augustine, Del., was burned last week. Loss, $100,000.

THE Louisiana Commission arrived at New Orleans on the 5th inst. On the same day Gov. Packard published an open letter to the President, complaining of the nature of the instructions issued to the Commissioners, in that they do not direct inquiry into the question as to who is the legal Governor of Louisiana. He says: "I am constrained to think that your Excellency is in doubt upon this point, as repeated requests for the recognition of my Government have not yet been responded to, and I confess that, having received several hundred more votes than some of the Republican Presidential electors, I did not anticipate that my title would thus be put in question. I earnestly urge that the investigation by the commission be not confined to the narrow inquiry of how Nicholls can be sustained and Packard starved to death for lack of money to support his Government." The Packard Senate also adopted a series of resolutions denouncing the pledges of Stanley Matthews and Charles Foster for the withdrawal of troops as a corrupt and dishonorable bargain; say they are slow to believe President Hayes is a party to such bargain; calling on the President to furnish the assistance necessary to protect against domestic violence and put down the Nicholls insurrection, etc.

POLITICAL.

IN regard to appointments, the President stated to a friend, the other day, that after the Southern question was disposed of he would be in a position to pay the required attention to them. It was inferred from his conversation that no important announcements would be made until the special session of Congress, but before that time he should consider and decide upon whatever changes it is necessary to make.... The Louisiana Commission left Washington for the South on Wednesday, the 3d inst. It is said they carry with them no formal instructions, but will be governed in their action by the views of the President, with which they have become thoroughly conversant by frequent interviews at the White House.

MUNICIPAL elections were held in many of the Western cities last week. We give the result on Mayor in the more prominent ones: In Chicago, Monroe Heath, Republican, was re-elected by a large majority; in Madison, Wis., Harlow S. Orton, Democrat, was elected; La Crosse, Geo. Edwards, Republican; Beloit, Wis., O. C. Johnson, Temperance; Grand Rapids, Mich., G. W. Thayer, Democrat; St. Louis, Mo., Henry Overstolz, Independent; Dubuque, Iowa, —— Burch, Republican; Cincinnati, Ohio, —— Moore, Republican; Minneapolis, Minn., John DeLaittre, Independent; Cleveland, Ohio, G. W. Rose, Republican.... The President's instructions to the Louisiana Commissioners have been published. They are of a general nature, recommending the employment of argument and persuasion, and the sounding of public sentiment affected by the present political controversy rather than the taking of formal testimony, of which the recent contests in that State have already furnished cart-loads now piled away in the State Department at Washington.

THE Rhode Island election has resulted in the choice of the Republican ticket by majorities ranging from 800 to 2,000.... A Washington dispatch says the "President has recently stated to several friends that the Bristow officials in various parts of the country, who were removed from office simply because they favored Bristow and reform, will, at the earliest convenient opportunity, be reinstated in their old places, or given other places equally good."

GENERAL.

RECENT fires: At Wheeling, W. Va., the Grant House was burned, loss $100,000; at Lincoln, Neb., several stores, $28,000; at Munsonville, N. H., a coffin factory, $50,000.... R. H. Macy, the heavy New York fancy dry-goods dealer, died recently in Paris.

ADVICES from Liverpool, received at New York March 31, state that ex-Mayor A. Oakey Hall, of New York, has arrived there in the steamer Victoria, from Boston.... The race at San Jose, Cal., between Rarus and Goldsmith Maid, March 31, was won by the Maid in three straight heats. Time 2:22¼, 2:16½, and 2:18½, in none of which did the Maid lead more than half a length.

A NEW YORK dispatch says: [illegible] vessels of the Long Island fishing fleet, which left for the banks last November, are now so long overdue that it is believed they were lost in the recent gales with all on board, numbering ninety-five men, most of whom leave wives and children. The vessels were valued at about $60,000, and are nearly covered by insurance.

THE Western Union telegraph has followed the lead of the Atlantic and Pacific Telegraph Company, and established a uniform rate of 25 cents for ten-word messages to all principal points North, East and West, covering the same general line of territory.

A GLIMMER of light has pierced the veil of mystery which has surrounded the recent movements of New York city's ex-Mayor. As almost invariably happens, there's a woman in the case. The woman is described as middle-aged, and not very fair to look upon. They are living together in a retired quarter of London.

ABE ROTHSCHILD, of Cincinnati, the reported murderer of Bessie Moore, at Jefferson, Texas, has been extradited to the Texas authorities, and taken to the scene of his crime for trial.

FOREIGN.

IT would appear now that the only serious difficulty to be overcome in establishing peace between Russia and Turkey is that of the demobilization of the respective forces of the two nations. Russia deems it a matter of national honor that the Porte should be the first to disarm, while the Ottoman Government considers it a rather risky business to place itself unarmed before such an implacable foe as its northern neighbor has always proven to be. Still, the matter may be settled, and it is certain that the prospects of peace are decidedly favorable.

THE Princess Charlotte, eldest daughter of the Crown Prince Frederick William, has been betrothed to the hereditary Prince of Saxe-Weiningen.... Count Henry Von Arnim has become blind through erysipelas, and is not likely to survive long.... Germany has concluded commercial treaties with Peru, Nicaragua and Guatemala.... Official announcement is made of the signing of the protocol by the powers.

BRITISH revenue returns for the financial year, which ended March 31, show the total revenue to be £78,565,036, which is £153,036 in excess of the budget estimate, and £1,433,343 in excess of the revenue the previous year.... The civil strife in Colombia, South America, is assuming the character of a religious war. The Congress has adopted a resolution to the effect that as soon as a prelate throws himself openly into the road of sedition, his effects shall be appropriated, the archepiscopal palace used as an office for the Secretary of War and of Marine, and the seditious prelate banished from the republic. A battle lasting seven hours was recently fought near Manigalas, resulting in a victory for the Government troops. .....Germany has concluded commercial treaties with Peru, Nicaragua and Guatemala.... Count Von Arnim has become blind from erysipelas. .....Dispatches from Berlin and Paris to the London papers represent the public feeling in those places as not increased in hopefulness by the signing of the protocol.

BISMARCK has asked for and been granted a year's leave of absence, to recuperate his health. .....The pacification of Mexico under Diaz was not of long duration. He has quarreled with one of his principal Generals, and revolutionary outbreaks have occurred in the various States. The friends of Lerdo, the banished ex-President, are particularly active, and there is a strong probability that he will be recalled to preside over the affairs of the unhappy Republic.

A SCHOOL-HOUSE in the Norwegian village of Ellongoe has been burned and sixteen children perished.... In spite of the signing of the protocol, military preparations are progressing vigorously in Russia, and in Constantinople the Porte is doing what it can to keep pace with the formidable operations of its enemy. The feeling of uneasiness still prevails throughout Europe, and the prospect of peace is regarded as anything but flattering.

THE text of the protocol, which was signed at London on the 31st of March, is transmitted by cable, together with the supplementary declarations made by Count Schouvaloff and Earl Derby at the time of affixing their signatures. These declarations are appended to the protocol, and would seem to be of greater significance than the instrument itself. On the part of Russia it is distinctly announced that any agreement for reciprocal disarmament must be preceded by the conclusion of peace with Montenegro, by the acceptance by the Porte of the advice of Europe to place the Turkish army on a peace footing, and by the demonstration of a readiness to undertake the reforms demanded. With these preliminaries settled, Russia will arrange with Turkey the subject of disarmament, but without them, and unless a repetition of the Bulgarian atrocities is prevented, Russia will veto all measures looking to the demobilization. Derby's declaration is equally significant of England's traditional distrust and hatred of Russia—being in effect a notice to the world that, in the event of a failure to secure peace between Russia and Turkey, England will regard the protocol as null and void, and hold herself at liberty to adopt a different policy.

How Dr. Mary Walker was Bounced.

Dr. Mary Walker is a standing office-seeker. For years her bloomers have hovered about ante-rooms of different Secretaries, until she has become such a bother that Secretary Sherman made an order to the doorkeeper that she be no longer admitted to any part of the Department. To-day she slipped by, and had reached the ante-chamber of the Secretary. Word was at once sent to the venerable gray-bearded man who guards the main door in Fifteenth street. He walked up to the second floor, and at once told Dr. Mary that she must go away. "You go to hell," answered Dr. Mary, vigorously; "I shall do nothing of the sort." At this the doorkeeper made a feeble pass at her, as he said, "Come now, you come out of that." At this suggestion of violence Dr. Mary jumped and clacked her heels together twice as she dropped her hand upon a hip pocket, saying, "You lay a hand on me and I will shoot you." The doorkeeper saw a chance for a flank movement. He seized Dr. Mary's right wrist, and then passed his venerable arm about her waist. He then began to propel her toward the street. Dr. Mary kicked his shins all the way and yelled murder, greatly to the amusement of persons in the hallways. After he had piloted her to the street he apologized for his forced rough treatment, and said that her importunity had brought it about. He asked her to pardon him, but Dr. Mary refused, bitterly saying that the country should yet ring with this outrage committed upon a free-born American citizen.—Washington Cor. New York Sun.

REMINISCENCES OF JOHN D. LEE.

What an Old Prospector and Frontiersman Knows of Him.

The San Francisco Call publishes an interesting interview with Capt. John Morse concerning the Mountain Meadow massacre. The gentleman referred to has figured during many years of an eventful life as a frontiersman, prospector, trapper and trader, and was in Utah prior to the Mormon settlement and for many years after. At the time of the massacre he was living with some bands of Indians, not more than thirty miles from Mountain Meadows, and two days after the tragedy he visited the scene and saw the mangled bodies of the slain lying on the ground as they had been left by the destroying horde of Mormon fanatics and their allies, the Indians. Capt. Morse was an intimate acquaintance of Lee, and this departed saint, in a conversation occurring years before the trial, admitted to Morse his complicity in the atrocities, but, as in his confession, threw the responsibility of the butchery upon the Mormon Church and directly implicated as an accessory before and after the fact Brigham Young. Morse disputes Lee's statement that there were 500 Indians present, claiming that there were not more than 300 in that whole section of the country. The butchery was planned by the Mormons and almost entirely effected by them, the Indians not killing over half a dozen. He says plunder was the chief incentive to the massacre. At that time the Mormons were excessively poor, having no money and scarcely anything else. They would trade their produce with the Indians even for old clothes. The train was a very rich one and excited their cupidity. Morse was with Lee a good deal during his residence in Southern Utah, and the latter unbosomed himself freely on the subject of the massacre, which seemed to so dwell on his mind that he constantly reverted to it. Concerning the implication of Brigham Young with the massacre, Morse relates an interview with Lee. "The last time I saw him was in Mahon county. I went to his ranch, and he received a letter—in fact, I brought it to him myself—from a place called Kanab, which stated that troops were on Lee's track hunting him up, and he had better move on a little further. He showed me the letter and I said: 'Lee, this is all an infernal lie; there are no troops on your track at all. This is all put up by those Mormons in St. George'—where Brigham Young was—'whom Brigham has influenced to get you out of the way. You take my advice, and go into the Gentile camp and give yourself up, and make a clean breast of the whole thing, and you will get along first-rate.' I asked him if Brigham Young was interested in the massacre. He at first said no. I said I knew better, and he said; 'Of course there is no use lying to you. As a matter of course, I was under orders. Brigham Young knew everything; he was with me from the time we left Salt Lake, but the intention was to let them pass on to Muddy and then catch them at Muddy. Do you suppose that any of those men—you know more of them—do you suppose they would have entered into this arrangement if they had not believed in the Mormon Church, and that this thing emanated from Brigham, their Mormon prophet?'" Capt. Morse says no attempt was made to procure his testimony further than that he was sent for to attend the first trial, but he did not appear, being down on the Colorado river, near Fort Yuma. Lee was confidential with him on account of their frequent solitary companionship on prospecting and other expeditions, and because he knew Morse had other sources of information from the Indians. Capt. Morse is now a resident of San Francisco.

Troops Withdrawn from Alaska.

One of the first acts of Secretary of War McCrary was to order the removal of the troops now stationed in Alaska. This is not only a measure of wise economy, but one of great humanity to the soldiers who have been kept there for the past few years. The force has consisted of two companies of infantry, and has numbered from eighty to 150 men. Owing to the severity of the climate and other causes, which will be understood by those familiar with the character of the people of Alaska, it has been found impracticable to keep the same troops in Sitka more than a year at a time. They are of no practical use, as there is no duty to perform, and, if it was necessary to use force to keep the natives in order, no provision for transporting troops to the different islands has ever been made. The extra expense of the military occupation of Alaska is about $50,000 a year. It costs about $10,000 to transport the troops there from a station on the Pacific coast, about $10,000 more to bring them back again at the end of the year, and from $20,000 to $30,000 a year has to be paid for the transportation of subsistence and other stores.

The Secretary of the Treasury will issue orders to the revenue-marine officers stationed in Alaska to use their vessels and men for preserving order among the natives if it is necessary.—Washington Telegram.

Frightened to Death.

A sad case of a little boy being frightened to death occurred recently at Astoria, Morgan county, Ill., the particulars of which are as follows: About 9 o'clock in the evening a son of Mr. Rowland, some 10 years of age, was passing along the streets of that town alone, when another boy, son of Dr. Wm. Toler, who was dressed in a hideous costume, and playing in the front yard at home, seeing the little fellow passing, played the part of a ghost, and jumping suddenly out upon the little fellow, at the same time making a strange noise, so frightened him that he fell prostrate on the pavement. He jumped up quickly and ran a few rods, when he again fell, this time a lifeless corpse. The affair created great excitement in the community, and both families are in grief over the tragic occurrence.

A Mother of Vice.

In New York a certain bad woman is spoken of as "Margaret, the mother of criminals." Of her progeny, now amounting to some 1,200 persons, all have been criminals or paupers, or both, and the prisons of the country nearly all possess representatives of this family. The total cost of this crowd to the country, on account of crime and pauperism foots up the sum of $1,308,000. Of this line there have been outlaws of every class, from beggars to murderers. Still some people will argue that marked criminals should not be pulled up by the roots.

A Thrilling Scene.

Leaning on my husband's arm, I was walking on the Rue de la Paix, about one block from the Vendome column, and was looking up at the column itself, admiring the effect produced by the dark bronze of the shaft against the gold-finished line of the sunset sky, the hour being about 6 in the afternoon, suddenly down the face of the column fell a human form with white and black draperies fluttering in the air; it struck the wreath of immortelles that surrounds the column at its juncture with the pedestal, and rebounded with such force that it was thrown clear over the railing that surrounds the base, and fell into the center of the outside pavement. I could not realize for a moment that I had really beheld that awful spectacle—a human being self-hurled into eternity—but such was indeed the meaning of what I had seen. In a moment the prostrate figure was surrounded by a dense crowd. The emotion of the spectators was extreme, and one old lady burst out crying in her agitation. The victim was a young and neatly-dressed woman. She lay prone on the pavement as she had fallen, but no trace of blood or mutilation was visible, as one of the bystanders had drawn her water-proof cloak around her shattered head, that having been the point that first struck the pavement. Her shoes, a neat pair of black lasting boots, had been forced from her feet by the fall, showing clean white stockings of a quality never worn in France by the working classes. One of her garters, also jerked off by the fall, lay near her—a dainty blue silk affair, with a gilded clasp. She had, as I afterward learned, gone most deliberately to work to execute her purpose. She had concealed a camp-stool under her water-proof before making the ascent. Arrived at the top, she had profited by a moment when the guide was busied in pointing out certain objects of interest in the view to another party, had then gone around to the opposite side, had placed her camp-stool there, mounted upon it, and so contrived to clamber over the high railing. I passed by the spot an hour later. The body had long since been removed, and the crowd was gone; but a few bystanders lingered under the darkening sky, looking alternately up at the summit of the gigantic shaft that towered above them and down at two crimson stains upon the pavement, upon which gravel had been hastily strewn, but which still revealed a dusky and ominous red through the pebbles and sand that tried to hide it.—Lucy H. Hooper's Letter from Paris in New York World.

A Nightmare Cure.

A Chinese physician says that in a case of nightmare, instead of rudely awaking the sleeper by bringing in a light, you should "bite his toe." This is a very simple remedy—at least Mrs. Poppleton thought so, for she treasured the recipe up in one of the chambers of her memory, and the other night, when Poppleton was seized with a two-horse power nightmare, seventeen hands high, and in a muffled and ghostly voice muttered, "Owhowhwoh! Ughughughuhu!" as if a circus elephant was performing tricks on his stomach, she quickly slid to the foot of the bed, and was in the act of seizing his big toe in her teeth, when the dreamer gave a vigorous kick, and, Mrs. Poppleton was shot over the tail-board of the bed on to the floor, with four teeth half way down her throat. The noise awakened Poppleton, and hearing his wife screaming at the rate of forty knots an hour, he thought no less than 10,000 masked burglars were in the room, and, without striking a light, he seized a chair and wildly struck right and left all over the room, nearly braining Mrs. Poppleton before he discovered the true situation of affairs. It was a terrible mistake, and Mrs. Poppleton was laid up two weeks and five days, and the first thing she did when she recovered sufficient strength was to smash $175 worth of Chinese curiosities she had purchased at the Centennial, and she says if she were a man she would go to China and not return home until she had spit upon that physician from figure-head to rudder. Or words to that effect. Poppleton enjoys his nightmares as of yore, without wifely interference.—Norristown (Pa.) Herald.

Useful Information.

Mercury is made to adhere to any metal by putting a very little sodium with the mercury—the hundredth part by weight is ample. The sodium mercury may, if necessary, be washed off by fresh, pure mercury, which continues to adhere.

A certain way to keep ants from sugar barrels, lard cans and preserve jars, says one who has tried it, is to tie a string wet with kerosene around the barrel, can, or jar. Repeat the wetting of the string with the kerosene oil every few days.

An English inventor proposes to pump exhausted steam back into the boiler, in place of condensing it, and experiments are now being conducted with an engine for testing the invention. The inventor contends that "the pressure exerted by the steam on one side of the piston represents, by its elastic power, the same expression of power in pressure on the other side, so that the elastic charge is always ready to give back the exact power expended for its expression."

From the Hills.

Extract from a letter from Deadwood: "All the houses and cabins in Deadwood City and the outlying camps are occupied, and the large number of buildings now being hastily put up does not seem sufficient to accommodate those who come. A great many parties are housed in their tents, or use the old-fashioned prairie schooners for their temporary quarters. There are about 5,000 people here, and the arrivals are from fifty to 100 per day. They come from all directions, Fort Pierre, Sidney, North Platte and Cheyenne. The only points from which stages have been running regularly are Sidney and Cheyenne, and so the large numbers who seek passage in that way are obliged to start from one or the other of those places."

AN INDIAN MASSACRE.

A Fearful Tragedy of Ten Years Ago.

[Standing Rock (Dakota) Cor. Chicago Tribune.]

Looking up the Missouri river to a point about eight miles above the fort, you see a small island, or sand-bar, which is known as Burnt-Boat island. Strange as it may appear, this insignificant sand-bar was the scene of one of the bloodiest tragedies that ever stained the pages of our frontier history. A recital of the details even now chills the marrow of my bones. It was in the year 1868 that a party of eighteen persons, embracing men, women, and children, left the Territory of Montana, well supplied with gold-dust, which they had been fortunate enough to collect in the mines during their sojourn of several years in that Territory. They had in the party about $150,000. Embarking in a Mackinaw boat at Fort Benton, they floated down the muddy torrent called the Missouri river to Fort Berthold, an Indian trading-post and agency. Here they landed, and remained several days for the purpose of refitting, and also because they had been advised that war with the Sioux was being waged by the Government, which rendered it dangerous to pass down the river. But they became impatient of the delay at Berthold, and also were suspicious of the motives of the traders who advised them not to proceed. It was intimated to them that the traders wished them to remain in order that they might make money out of them, their custom being valuable. They launched their boat again. Every man was armed, and a good marksman. A small brass cannon, called a swivel, was placed in the bow of the boat. The gold-dust was put away into little drawers and boxes, built in the boat under the seats and in the bow and stern. During the first night and day all went well, and no Indians were seen. The party camped on shore, and hauled up the boat on dry land. On the second day, in the afternoon, they had passed the mouth of the Square Buttes creek, twelve miles above Fort Lincoln. The current is very rapid here, as everywhere on the Missouri. A mile or two lower down a horseman was seen on a bluff on the east bank of the river, which circumstance aroused the party in the boat to attention. There seemed to be nothing for them to do, however, but to float on down the river and to keep their powder dry; and this they did. They had now arrived abreast of a strip of wood from which was poured a volley of rifle-bullets, and from which issued the the yells of a party of Indians. Some of these shots struck the boat, but nobody was killed or seriously hurt, in consequence of the distance of the boat from shore. It was not intended by the Indians that this volley should have any other effect than that of driving the boat over toward the sand-bar and western bank of the river, which, unhappily, was effected with the precision and thoroughness of all Indian stratagems. The boat was rowed rapidly over toward the sand-bar, on which not a living thing could be seen. It seemed to be but a few inches above the level of the river, and I am told that the Indians who lay there in ambush were almost entirely covered with sand, and, consequently, invisible. The boat had arrived within a few yards of the sand-bar, and the party probably had the intention of landing and repairing any damage to the boat that may have been inflicted by the volley from the eastern bank. When they had approached so near the bar that to recede or sheer off was impossible, the Sioux who were covered with sand raised their heads, aimed their rifles, and fired a fatal volley into the passengers on the little Mackinaw boat. Nearly all were killed or wounded at the first volley. The men in the boat succeeded in firing off the swivel once or twice, and those who were not too badly wounded kept at the fight as long as strength lasted, but they were finally killed to the last soul—not one remained to tell the story. The boat was dragged ashore by the Indians, and all that they considered valuable was taken from the bodies and the boat.

A Fresh Importation.

Mistress—"Come, Bridget, how much longer are you going to be about filling that pepper-box?" Bridget (a fresh importation from where they don't use pepper-casters)—"Shure, ma'am, and its meself can't say how long it'll be takin' me to git all this stuff in the thing through the little holes in the top."

AGRICULTURAL AND DOMESTIC.

Around the Farm.

Procure seeds early from the seed stores. The assortments are always the best early.

Do not buy fruit trees from the extravagantly colored pictures shown by traveling agents.

The wingless female of the canker worm begins to crawl up the trees as soon as the ground thaws.

Pruning must be done before or wait till after the sap flows. Use wax or paint to cover the large wounds.

A young farmer friend asks us what he will do to make money. Buy a sow and pigs and take care of them.

If young lambs are coming along about these times those having care of them must recollect Mark xiii. 37.

Cows should be dried off from four to six weeks before calving. Give them generous food of moist hay, but little grain.

Horses that have been kept on hay and corn fodder can now be grained more thoroughly preparatory for the spring work.

If you are going to set fruit trees in the spring it is time orders were made and sent to some reliable nurseryman, as near home as possible.

See that plows, harrows, corn-markers, corn-planters, seeders, singletrees, harness and everything needed in putting in crops, are in perfect repair.

Manure, rich and well-rotted, is the one thing needed for the gardens, East, West, North or South. Have it ready in time before all hands drive afield.

Let the boys, when home from school Saturdays, build neat houses for martins blue birds and wrens, and put them up about houses, barns and fruit yards.

Insects are to be fought at any time. Remove the eggs of the tent caterpillar before they hatch. They will be found near the end of the twigs, wound around like a neat band.

Allow young calves to have the milk of the cow for four or five days. The first milk is medicinal, and it is necessary the young animals should have it to make them healthy.

Fruit trees can be profitably washed with strong soap-suds or lye. It can be done any time now until the busy season commences. It kills dormant insects, removes mosses and lichens, and improves the trees generally.

The peddlers of apple trees grafted on Canada stock are humbuggers of the worst kind. But the people need not be humbugged unless they want to be. It is a free country, and none of their natural rights should be taken.

Breeding sows should have potatoes or succulent food before farrowing. Put poles around the pen eight inches from the floor and the same distance from the sides, to keep the sows from overlaying their pigs. Give them clean, well-littered beds, but not enough to endanger the young.

Why in the olden times did men live to such immense ages? It was not permitted that meat should be eaten until after the flood. So, if you want to live long in the land it is time to begin preparations for the early garden, for there is where many of God's blessings come from.

If fruit trees have been gnawed by mice and rabbits during the deep snows, if it does not amount to entire riddling, smooth off the torn and rough edges and paint thoroughly with grafting wax, or make a plaster of dry and fresh cow dung and cover thickly, and bind on with a cloth.

Construction of Hot-Beds.—Although fine plants of nearly all kinds of those vegetables that require to be raised in hot-beds may generally be found in city markets, it is better for every farmer to raise plants for his own garden in hot-beds of his own. March is the most suitable month for making hot-beds, for the rigors of winter have by that time passed away, and vegetation in the open ground has not commenced. Farmers have generally abundant material for a hot-bed, and glass is cheap—a few sashes, six feet by three, will not cost much; but, even without glass, celery, tomatoes, cabbage, etc., may be grown in hot-beds covered with oiled paper, cotton cloth or mats, and exposed to sunshine in mild, warm weather. Though a large number of plants may be raised in a small bed if they are transplanted from the bed before they have received damage from crowding, it is better to give the plants plenty of room by making the hot-bed large and sowing the seed thin.

About the House.

To Keep Moths, Beetles, etc., from the Clothes.—Put a piece of camphor in a linen bag, or some aromatic herbs in the drawers, among linen or woolen clothes, and neither moth nor worm will come near them.

To prevent ink damaging metallic pens, throw into either the inkstand or the bottle in which the ink is kept a few nails, broken bits of steel pens not varnished, or any piece of iron not rusted. The corrosive action of the acid contained in the ink will be expended in the iron introduced.

Remember that mirrors should never be hung where the sun shines directly upon them. They soon look misty, grow rough or granulated, and no longer give back a correct picture. The amalgam, or union of tinfoil with mercury, which is spread on glass to form a looking-glass, is easily ruined by the direct, continued exposure to the solar rays.

Liquid Blue.—Take half a pound of best double oil of vitriol, mix one ounce of Spanish indigo pounded very fine, and scrape in a little chalk; have an iron pot half full of sand; set this on the fire; when the sand is hot, put the bottle in, and let the vitriol, etc., boil gently for a quarter of an hour; take the whole off the fire and let it stand for twenty-four hours, and then bottle it for use.

Keeping Piano Keys White.—It is said that piano keys will not turn yellow if exposed in a light room. Never close an instrument with ivory keys. Throw a sheet over when sweeping and dusting. Wet a soft cloth in alcohol and rub off all dirt, then expose as much as possible to the sunshine. If they are very yellow it will take a few weeks to restore the original whiteness. To facilitate the process, re-wet with alcohol once or twice, though they will whiten without in time.

How to Clean Blankets.—Put two large table-spoonfuls of borax and a pint bowl of soft soap into a tub of cold water. When dissolved, put in a pair of blankets and let them remain there over night. Next day rub them out and rinse thoroughly in two waters, and hang them to dry. Do not wring them. This recipe will also apply to the washing of all kinds of flannels and woolen goods. It is equally useful in washing lace curtains and mosquito bars. Remember not to wring the article washed. Invariably use cold water.

SPIRIT-LAND.

News from the Other World—Messages from a Murdered Editor—He Still Wields the Pen.

Stephen S. Jones, the editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, who was lately killed in Chicago, has been heard from in the spirit land. Jones' name still stands at the head of the editorial column of the paper as editor and proprietor. His son-in-law, John C. Bundy, announces, over his own name as acting editor and business manager, that the course of the paper and its tone will be unchanged, and that Mr. Jones, being freed from the trammels of the flesh, will be able to do more for the paper than he has done heretofore. To unbelieving ears an editorial and proprietary interest in an earthly journal by one of the heavenly host sounds queer. If Spiritualism is what it is claimed to be this is certainly a rare chance to show its power. Mr. Jones is a thorough exponent of the doctrine, one who has given his life to its unfoldment, and, now that he has reached that land, sends back word that his teachings were all true and that he will be "able to do twice, if not thrice, as much" as when in the flesh. The following communications are given as coming from the great editor:

Dear Francis: This is kind of you to allow me a word, so soon after leaving my mortal body, you and I having been so long and so intimately acquainted. I need not tell you how wickedly the press has traduced and vilified my life doings, for you no doubt have read it. But, thank God, my friend, you know better than they do the object and aim of my life. While I was not immaculate, yet if I know my own heart, and I thought I did, it was to better my fellow-man, and no man living knew that fact better than you did. Your friend and brother,

S. S. Jones.

The following communication was then sent him, the object being to find out just how it seems to be transported to paradise:

My Dear Brother Jones: What were your sensations when first awakening in spirit life?

In response he said:

As to that, Francis, it was very like what I communicated this morning. When awakened to consciousness I looked about me and asked myself, "Where am I?" At that moment my son George was standing by me, probably to catch the first word spoken by me. I recognized my son, and he advanced and we embraced as no one but a loving father and son could. I said to George, "Where am I, and what does this mean?" He replied, "Father, you are a spirit!" "Yes," said I; "yes; I now realize it." I looked about me and said to George, "All that has been told me of the summer land is true." Your friend, S. S. Jones.

Then follows:

Dear Brother Jones: Have you found the statements you made in your articles, "Well, What of It?" realized in spirit life?

In response he said:

Every word and idea verified to a dot.

The following was sent:

Dear Brother Jones: What celebrities have visited you since your entrance to spirit life?

To which the editor replied:

My Dear Francis: As to that I have not been able to meet many besides my own dear ones yet. I have been called upon by Theodore Parker, John Pierpont, Joshua Giddings and Robert Owen, but above a passing salute nothing was said. I was too weak to talk with any one.

By the by, I recognized a spirit that I met in my early life. He lived in my native town in Vermont—Ira Day. S. S. Jones.

The following inquiry was forwarded:

Dear Brother: Can you do as much for the Journal and reform in spirit life as you could in this?

In response he said:

Yes, dear Francis, I shall be able to do twice, if not thrice, as much as when with you in the office, if I can have the proper medium through whom to advise. I do not want the paper changed in tone, size or price. S. S. Jones.

The Casualties of War.

The official statistics as to the number of killed and wounded in the German army during the war with France have just been published at Berlin. The number of officers killed and wounded was 3,319, and of soldiers, 60,978. The number of officers and of soldiers who were either killed or died of their wounds was 1,374 and 16,877 respectively. The proportion of the killed to the wounded was 1 in 3.44 for the officers, and 1 in 5 for the men. As a matter of course, the great majority of the killed and wounded belonged to the infantry, which lost 57,942, as compared to 2,236 in the cavalry and 4,266 in the artillery. Only 5,084 were killed or wounded by artillery fire, as against 55,862 by musketry fire; and, though artillery had never been so much employed as in the Franco-German war, 21 losses out of every 23 on the German side were due to infantry fire. These figures are interesting, for they seem to confirm the theory that the effect of artillery fire upon the battle-field is moral rather that material—that it frightens more soldiers than it kills. Some instructive statistics are also given as to the seat of the wounds inflicted. Thus, it appears that, out of 64,897 men of all ranks killed or wounded, 12,717 were hit either upon the head or the neck, and this shows that the French troops must have fired very high. In the Crimean war, upon the contrary, the highest percentage of wounds were in the lower part of the body—a fact which is all the more remarkable as a large number of the men killed or wounded were serving in the trenches.

Woman's Enterprise.—It is a singular fact that the first daily newspaper in the English language was founded by a woman—Elizabeth Mallet, of London. It was called the Daily Courant, and appeared March, 1702, during the reign of Queen Anne. It was not devoted to woman's rights or wrongs, but was as much for man's relief as any body's; for it was printed, as its frank and fair proprietor stated, "to spare the publick at least half the impertinences which the ordinary papers contain."

STORMING THE ALAMO.

One of Santa Anna's Soldiers Tells the Story of [illegible] Regarding the Dying Moments of the Famous Texan Leaders.

(San A[illegible]

The [illegible] railway by a Boston [illegible] 800 miles to San A[illegible] Texas, has invested with fresh interest the memories of this ancient capital coeval with Philadelphia. Everywhere, in every city and hamlet of the United States, the play entitled, "The Alamo; or Death of David Crockett," has appealed to the passions of the multitude. When this railway was finished last week, I went with a great throng to San Antonio and gathered the facts here detailed, which give the Mexican aspect of the old familiar story. The recital as given is a careful translation by Col. Ford, commonly known as "Old Rip," a frontier member of the Texas Senate. The old Mexican soldier, the raconteur, is named Francisco Buerra, born in Guanajuato, in 1810. He became a soldier in 1828, was of the army that stormed the Alamo in 1836, and was captured by the Texans at San Jacinto. He became a citizen of Texas, served in the war of 1846-47 against his native country, and in the Confederate army in the war between the States. He is now an honored and aged citizen of Brownsville, and his recital of facts as seen by a Mexican at the storming of the Alamo has peculiar value in the eyes of your Southwestern readers.

Santa Anna was joined at Laredo, where he crossed the Rio Grande, by Gen. Cos, who, in violation of the terms of his recent surrender at San Antonio, was forced to join Santa Anna and return into Texas. The movements of the Mexican army were greatly retarded by fires on the prairie, which rendered the horses of the whole force almost useless. Deaf Smith, a famous Texan scout, was the author of this mischief. Santa Anna halted a day or two at Medina, when he was met by Senor Novarro and a priest, who gave the General accurate information as to the strength—268 men in the Alamo—of the Americans in San Antonio. A sudden rain-storm and "norther" made the river impassable, and a forced march and immediate assault impossible. Next day he resumed the march, Gen. Mora in advance with orders to seize the mission of the Conception, a massive stone structure deemed by Santa Anna a more defensible stronghold than the Alamo. A cannon-shot was fired when the head of the advancing column reached the cemetery. The town was not defended, and Col. Mora was ordered to take a position north and east of the Alamo to prevent the escape of the garrison. This was late in February, 1836. Santa Anna led 4,000 men and waited the coming of Gen. Talza with 2,000 more. A battalion crossed the San Antonio river and took possession of houses below the Alamo to build a bridge across the river. Thirty men of two companies sent the next day to make a reconnoissance were killed. A light earthwork was thrown up above the Alamo. The firing from the fort, now invested on every side, was ceaseless. An earthwork nearer the fort was constructed at night. On the 3d day of March Gen. Talza arrived, and the plan of assault was defined and made known to the division commanders. On the 5th of March scaling ladders were distributed. At 3 o'clock in the morning of the 6th, ever memorable in Texan song and story, the the Battalion Matamoras was moved to a point near the river and above the Alamo.

They were supported by 2,000 men under Gen. Cos, this wing of the army being commanded by Gen. Castrillon, Gen. Talza leading that below the Alamo. Santa Anna spent the night in the earthworks near the Alamo. The whole force was to move silently upon the fortress at the bugle-sound, and not to fire till in the trenches of the Texans. The bugle was heard at 4 o'clock. Gen. Castrillon's division, after half an hour's desperate fighting, and after repeated repulses and unheard-of losses, succeeded in effecting an entrance in the upper part of the Alamo, in a sort of outwork, now a court-yard. The fighting had only begun. The doors and windows of the Alamo building were barricaded and guarded by bags of sand heaped up as high as a man's shoulders, and on the roof were rows of sand-bags, behind which the Texans fought as men never fought before—muzzle to muzzle, hand to hand. Each Texan rifle-shot exhausted its force and spent itself in successive bodies of Mexicans packed together like a wall of flesh. Muskets and rifles were clubbed, and bayonets and bowie-knives never wrought such fearful carnage.

The ceaseless crash of firearms, the shouts of the defiant, desperate, beleaguered Texans, the shrieks of the dying, made the din infernal and the scene indescribable in its sublime terrors. Each room in the building was the scene of a desperate struggle with fearless men driven to desperation, and conscious that escape was impossible. They fought even when stricken down, and when dying still struggled, not with death, but to slay Mexicans. In the long room used as a hospital the sick and wounded fired pistols and rifles from their pallets. A piece of artillery supposed to be that which Crockett had used during the siege, was shotted with grape and canister and turned upon the desperate occupants of this apartment.

After the explosion the Mexicans entered and found the emaciated bodies of fourteen men, torn and rent and blackened and bloody. Forty-two dead Mexicans lay at the doorway of this room. Bowie, whose name tells of his fearful knife and deeds, lay stark and stiff on a cot in this room. He was helpless and in bed when the place was invested ten days before.

Eleven Texans fired with terrible effect from the roof of the building, where they used three or four field-pieces, which they charged with nails and pieces of iron. Buerra, like all others, gives his peculiar version of the story that recounts the facts affecting the death of Travis and of Crockett. These two were found living, yet exhausted by death-dealing, and lying among the dead.

When Travis was discovered he gave a Mexican gold, and, while conversing with him, Gen. Cos, with whom Travis had dealt most generously when San Antonio was captured by the Americans, appeared. Cos embraced Travis, and induced other officers to join him in asking Santa Anna to spare Travis' life. The President-General sternly refused. Then Crockett, from among the corpses, stood up, utterly exhausted by weary, sleepless days and nights, and by five hours' constant fighting.

Santa Anna was enraged beyond measure that his orders were not executed. He directed the soldiers near him to fire on the two Texans. Travis was shot first in the back. He folded his arms across his breast, and stood stiffly erect till a bullet pierced his neck. He fell upon his face while Crockett's body was riddled with bullets. The corpses of 2,000 Mexicans were buried; those of the dead Americans were gathered and burned—a holocaust whose fires lighted the way to Texan freedom.

Victor Hugo.

Yesterday was the 75th birthday of Victor Hugo, and yesterday saw the publication of his new poem, the second part of "La Legende des Siecles." It is a little strange to reflect that France still possesses her greatest poet, and that in great age his lyric force is not abated. Yet it will probably be allowed by foreigners, if not by Frenchmen, that Victor Hugo is the greatest name in the roll of French literary worthies. Other countries must look back to some distant time to find the singer whose they chiefly delight to honor. England possessed in Shakspeare a poet whose place seems set above the reach of mortal ambition. Each generation has its favorites, whom new generations may accept or reject, but Shakspeare is always outside the risk of rivalry. In Germany a more recently developed literature finds her chief triumphs in the plays and poems of Goethe, and of his far-reaching tranquil knowledge of men and things. In Italy no fifth name has for centuries been added to those of the four chief poets, and among them Dante holds the chief place, unchallenged and unapproached. But France has waited until this century for her poet of widest range, of most precious value, of most musical tongue, a "mighty-voiced inventor of harmonies." The din of the controversy in which French poetry awakened to a brief life in the restoration has fallen silent, the dust has cleared away, and the renown of Victor Hugo is as solid as his partisans long ago were quarrelsome and noisy. We come, a later generation, and see and hear the poet as if with the eyes and ears of posterity. Foreigners are not tempted greatly to take one or other of the sides in which politics, religion, fashion had as much to say as pure appreciation of literature. And foreigners find in Victor Hugo—we are speaking of him as a poet—the qualities that they gladly recognize, and the other qualities whose absence they lament, in the earlier classes of France.—London News.

A Wasted Life.

Christian Hanson, arraigned in the Police Court on a charge of attempt at burglary, informed the Justice that he made the attempt that he might get into State prison. Being asked why he wanted to go to State prison, he answered: "Judge, I have only just come from Columbus, O., where I served ten years in State prison for burglary. I was pardoned out by Gov. Hayes, now President of the United States. My original sentence was for twenty years. My life is wasted and I am a wreck. God knows I intended, when I came out of prison, to live an honest life. I was pardoned out the 5th of last month. I went to Cincinnati and tried to get work, but failed. From there I went to Pittsburgh, and met with no better success. Then I tramped it all the way to New York, where I had friends, trying to get work from farmers on the way, sleeping where I got an opportunity, and eating whenever charitable persons gave me a crust. My friends here, who knew me before I was a criminal, refuse to recognize me. I can't get work. I have lived in the gutter and been kicked about. I dread to kill myself, and so, with the horrors of prison life still before me, I am obliged to go back. There is nothing else left for me." Hanson, later, said the crime for which he was convicted was robbery of the First National Bank of Cincinnati of $40,000 in bonds and $5,000 in greenbacks.—New York Herald.

Grasshopper Oil.

Prof. J. H. Fowler writes as follows to the Des Moines State Register: One barrel of grasshoppers contains from three to four gallons of a fine grade of machine oil. There is none better for sewing machines, printing-presses, reapers, etc. It will pay to propagate them for the oil that is in them. A rendering apparatus, the same as packing houses use, will be all that is needed, and the manufacturer can afford to pay 75 cents to $1 per barrel for hoppers, and there will be plenty of men and boys and girls that will contrive to secure the hopper. He says also that, if caught when young and put in good salt brine and left in for fifteen days, then taken out and smoked and boxed the same as herring, they could be shipped East and used for hopper soup, which has a fine flavor, and would sell as readily as shrimps or oysters. They feed on pure vegetable matter, and no impure thing passes into their composition, and, if you only think so, they are splendid for digestion. Also one spoonful of the oil before going to bed at night will cure the most cases of indigestion.

Punishing Rebels in Japan.

Eleven of the ringleaders of the late rebellion in Japan have been beheaded, while 241 persons have been sentenced to hard labor for life. Four men of high birth, wishing to escape the indignity of decapitation, made their way out of prison and committed the "happy dispatch," after passing a whole day in feasting, singing and dancing. There has since been another outbreak, but of a comparatively trivial character, and having nothing to do with the nobility. Two thousand farmers assassinated an obnoxious tax collector, and were about to besiege the Governor of the province in a Buddhist monastery, when troops arrived, and the rioters retired.

A London evening paper prints the following extract from the Gentleman's Magazine, Sept. 24, 1754: "Married—Robert Phillips, Esq., of Wittington, near Hereford, brother of the celebrated John Phillips, the poet, aged 80, to Miss Anna Bowdler, aged near 80, after a courtship of sixty years, the marriage having been postponed in courtesy to some relatives who disapproved."

FOR THE LADIES.

The World of Fashion.

Styles in Gloves.—Gloves long on the wrist remain fashionable; for street and visiting, from three to four buttons being most in favor, while for evening from four to twelve buttons are worn. As to coloring we observe no remarkable changes. Wood shades in much variety are shown, and by reason of their real beauty and delicacy of tint remain in vogue. Browns in every conceivable difference of shade are again shown; light grays, the palest running into a clear lavender; slates and drabs. Ivory shades, moreover, are again introduced, nor is this surprising when we remember how really handsome and refined they are.

Novelties in Millinery.—For early spring, rough-and-ready straws are presented in considerable variety as to color, and in shapes which for the most part fit closely to the head. Few are of one color throughout, the majority showing combinations of colored with white or black straw, the colorings sometimes running in diagonal lines across the bonnet, or sometimes in regular alternations of colored straw. For dress bonnets, chip is in much favor, white being generally preferred, and here the shapes are quite elegant, with close-fitting brims, rather high crowns, and the fronts rising only high enough to admit of a ruching below. Flowers in general are lavishly used, and for the most part are placed on bonnets in the same heavy monture style as during the winter. The "Mother Goose" chapeau has quite a piquant appearance. This style has a lace scarf fastened at the back, and the ends are brought forward, crossed beneath the chin; the effect is blooming, and hence attractive for evening wear.

Fashionable Dress Materials.—With the opening of spring, the dark shades become somewhat lightened in tone, but only to a slight degree; while to the pale hues, which have prevailed, others have been added which are decidedly brighter. Light woolen goods in very small checks, black and white, dark blue, or brown, etc., are shown, and to a certain extent will be patronized. Prices, medium width, 50 cents per yard. Percales are in dark colors, chiefly brown or blue, and are either solid, with lace borders, or covered with figures. These are sometimes small, broken designs, flowers, or often rather conspicuous stripes appear in white, gold, light blue, or crimson on a dark ground. Prices are about 35 cents per yard. Linens for summer wear are much darker than they have been for some time past, quite a noticeable change having taken place in this class of goods, which, whatever the novelties shown, seem always in demand. Prices vary from 28 to 50 cents per yard. Beautifully fine all-wool plaided goods for children are presented in entirely new combinations, which are hard to describe, and, which really to be appreciated should be seen. Soft interminglings of blue appear in plaids, something in Scotch style, while in broken bars upon them are showings of mode colors, fawn, pink, apricot, ciel, and faust—the new red. This class of fabrics is called cashmere enfantin. Thin lawns and organdies are covered with bright flowers, and some are provided in addition with bright borders in similar or contrasting styles, the latter being stamped in imitation of lace or fringe. Then again we find organdies showing stripes of gay color on dark grounds, something in the style of the [illegible] of which mention has been made, while a third variety displays twills of handsomely-contrasting colors. Gauzes for evening wear show stylish intermixtures of plush or velvet combined with figures in the new designs, and here in an especial manner, of course, the pale evening colors are represented. Rich gauze fabrics also show the bright Oriental combination of color in Persian patterns, and are, as may be supposed, extremely effective in appearance.

Shoes.—The long winter, with its snow, ice and slush, has been the means of inducing many ladies to adopt wide-soled, broad-heeled shoes as a permanent article of foot clothing. At the first sight of wide toes, broad soles, and low heels on a lady's foot, one is very much inclined to exclaim, "How ugly!" But, when the graceful carriage and firm tread of the wearer are observed, a second glance at the foot is the result, and if the shoe is seen to fit well and follow the natural outline of the foot, it is easy to reconcile the mind to so desirable a change. It is useless to argue that such shoes "are all very well for winter use;" they are equally desirable for tramps through shady dells, rambles over rocky hillsides, or long walks beside the sounding sea; and the foot that has once enjoyed the liberty of such a boot is certain to rebel, in the most emphatic manner, against being again incased in a narrow-toed, high-heeled prison. Indian goat of the best quality is the favorite material with both makers and wearers. If used with ordinary care boots and shoes made from this can be worn for three months without being polished; simply brushing the dust off with a dry brush will keep them in good order for that length of time. This eulogium applies only to the best quality of this goods, as there are several inferior grades, and some very poor imitations. French kid has been held in such high favor that the production of it is unequal to the demand. American kid has been substituted, but the secret of dressing and curing it like the French article has not yet been divulged; as a consequence it does not retain its polish so long, but aside from this objection it is a fair article only.

Alive Yet.

Dr. Louis, of New Orleans, who is something of a wag, called on a colored Baptist minister, and propounded a few puzzling questions. "Why is it," said he, "that you are not able to do the miracles that the apostles did? They were protected against all poisons and all kinds of peril. How is it that you are not protected in the same way?" The colored brother responded promptly, "Don't know about that, doctor, I 'spect I is. I've taken a mighty sight of strong medicine from you, doctor, and I's alive yet!"

A Kentucky widow had so much pity on a poor tramp that she married him and gave him a home. The routes to Kentucky are now almost blockaded.

TAKING THE END OF THE SEAT.

'Twas a morning clear, in the new-born year,
  When the frost was holding revel;
The church bells' call, from the belfries tall,
  Pealed forth o'er the town so level.

Then the people dressed in their extra best
  Went to church on this Sabbath morning
With thoughts [illegible] bent on [illegible] content,
  And the [illegible] adorning.

The church doors wide, for the coming tide,
  Said plainly as words could say,
"You're welcome all, who hear this call,
  Come worship in here to-day."

The coming throng, as they press along,
  Feel the joy of the sacred place,
Till down the aisle they walk erewhile
  And search with wistful face—

And search again 'mid the selfish train
  Who have taken the end of each seat;
"Just one in a pew, no room for you,
  [illegible]"

Will you leave the church, be left in the lurch,
  Or try the gantlet of thorns;
Tread over the feet to get in the seat
  And crush their numberless corns?

If you are slim, your sails in trim,
  Your success may be complete;
But, if you are large, 'tis a desperate charge,
  The attempt to get into the seat.

'Tis a terrible plight to be fastened tight,
  Your sleeves in some one's bonnet;
But one more lunge, one vaulting plunge,
  At last you've surely done it.

One good you got of this [illegible] feat—
  And you know revenge is sweet—
You've battered the [illegible] and crushed the [illegible]
  Of the one in the end of the seat.

But should there come some timid one
  Who shrinks such [illegible],
Or a stranger [illegible] defend
  From the one in the end of seat.

O what is the reason [illegible]
  These folks with [illegible]
Will compel such [illegible] seat in church
  While they sit in the end of the seat?

At last our prayer has been heard and we can give [illegible] a genuine effusion from the poet laureate of the country. He does not strike out on "spring," like a love-sick swain, but sticks to the tangible, the solid logical argument of fact.

HAYES' SPECIALTIES.

Come out you down—we'll sing a song—
Behold the colors that has flown above the Hayes Vocals ever long;
As Hayes was CHOSEN by fraud you know,
They flung out their stars and stripes above
The great eagle to rejoice and crow.
Now that liberty is dead, let us all weep.
Our country is in the grave of corruption and most asleep.

The thieves on office all hold tight,
Hayes and Wheeler gives them the mite,
Florida and other states for Hayes did go.
For a band of thieves called the Returning Board counted them so.
The bloody shirt—long may it wave,
Over the land and home of the white slave.
Ho, ye sinners, that voted for Hayes,
Reflect on the past and mend your ways,
Hundreds now threatened by appalling starvation,
Hayes broken promise and a ruined nation

Mr. Hayes's Cousin.

The President's private secretary opened the door leading to the inner room, and annouced in a loud and distinct voice:

"A gentleman who says that he is a relative of Mrs. Hayes!" equally loud and distinct, "show him in. I am always glad to see family connections. By the way, ask my shorthand writer to come in, too."

The relative of Mrs. Hayes approached the President and winked. Mr. Hayes approached the relative of Mrs. Hayes and winked in return. The shorthand reporter also winked and took out his notebook.

"I see you don't recognize me," said the relative of Mrs. Hayes. "My name is Pettengill, and I live in Oshkosh. My wife is a cousin of your excellent lady."

"Put that down," said Mr. Hayes to the shorthand writer. The shorthand writer winked and put it down.

"My dear Pettengill, I am delighted to see you. I regard Mrs. Hayes's cousins as my own cousins," said Mr. Hayes cordially. "You got that?" he added, turning to the reporter.

"I came east," continued the cousin of Mrs. Hayes, "to see about the Oshkosh Post Office. Some of the people there think I would make a good postmaster, and, of course, being a cousin"——

"Pardon me, dear Mr. Petengill," said Mr. Hayes, speaking slowly in order that the reporter might catch every word. "I have no doubt that you would make an admirable, faithful, and efficient postmaster, and it would give me great pleasure to sign your appointment. But, you see, there's one insurmountable obstacle in the way. The fact of your cousinship disqualifies you for any position in my gift. Good day, sir. I am sorry"——

"Hold on, Mr. President," whispered the cousin; "this won't do. That is the same form of rejection you used week before last, when I came from Main to apply for the collectorship of Kennebunk. Try something else—some new sarcasm."

The shorthand man consulted his notes and corroborated the statement of the cousin.

"Well, then," said Mr. Hayes, "cross out what you have written and begin again. My worth cousin, I am gratified to have met you. Mrs. Hayes often speaks of her great affection for your estimable wife, and of the delightful harmony which reigns in your domestic circle."

"That is good," interrupted the cousin, "and it's new."

"I cannot," continued Mr. Hayes, after thinking for a moment, "in view of the esteem in which I hold you and your charming family, thrust upon you the cares and anxieties of a post office. I cannot, I cannot Mr. Pettengill! Good morning."

The shorthand writer got up to go. "Manifold the dialogue," said Mr. Hayes, "and send it to all the papers."

"Am I to come again Mr. President?" asked Mrs. Hayes's cousin.

"You had better apply next week," said Mr. Hayes, "for a post office somewhere in the Middle States, or else a lighthouse on the Pacific coast. And couldn't you manage to put a little more chargin in your face as you go out? The ante-room is full of newspaper correspondents. Try and look as if you had been badly snubbed. Perhaps even a slight manifestation of temper would help along civil service reform."

The Real Truth.

"I don't think I ever saw you here before,' mused the court, as Samuel Grover walked out.

"No, I guess not, for I arrived here from Mexico only yesterday.'

"Ah, oh? Was Diaz well when you left?'

"He seemed to feel all right.'

"What part of Mexico are you from, Mr. Grover?'

'From—from—from—.'

"Don't be in a hurry, Mr. Grover. If you have forgotten the name of the town I'll wait till it occurs to you. It wasn't the town of Podunk, was it?'

"That's the town—that's the place" replied the prisoner, his anxious look giving way to a smile of relief.

"Reaching this city from the town of Podunk, Mexico, after leaving President Diaz in the best of health, you tried to put a man out of his own corner grocery, and were arrested while throwing brick at a hod carrier. That's about it, isn't it?'

The prisoner made no reply, and after a long silence, he suddenly asked:

"Judge wouldn't it be better to own up that I live on Twelfth street, and that I got drunk because my wife wanted a divorce?'

"I knew that all the time, Mr. Grover, but if you prefer to hail from Mexico I can't help myself.'

"Well, I'll tell the truth, your Honor. I'm having heaps of trouble with my wife, and I don't care a cent what becomes of me.'

"It's him that's made all the trouble!' screamed a female voice from near the door. 'Let me get through this crowd and tell the Judge what a vagabond, villain, liar and mean man that fellow is!'

"Say three months, Judge, whispered the prisoner, heading for the corrider.

"There it is!"

When the woman reached the bar her husband was seated on the back of a chair in the corrider, picking his teeth with a sliver, and as he caught his wife's eye, he said softly:

"Plenty to eat and the tenderest treatment for three long months to come!'

A Blighted Life.

A few mornings since, a Philadelphia matron called to see her young married daughter, and found her weeping bitterly.

"O, mother, take me home. My heart is broke,' sobbed the daughter, throwing herself into her mother's arms.

After her tears had somewhat subsided, the mother said.

"Hardly a year married, and here I find you in tears. What does this mean? Has Henry been unkind to you?'

"No,' sobbed the daughter, "but he doesn't love me any longer, and my heart is breaking.'

"Come, come, child, cheer up. Tell me why you think him untrue to you. Does he show it?'

"Yes,' was the heartbroken reply.

"O, the scoundrel! O, the viper!' gasped the mother. "My poor, dear child!' she fairly sobbed, "your mother won't desert you. She'll bring that villian to his knees. What insult has he offered you, my child? Speak, tell me the worst.'

"O, mother, I can't.'

"You must, my child. Tell me, though the heavens fall, what outrage has he committed?'

"He swore last night when I put my cold feet against his back,' sobbed the daughter.

"Is that all?' gasped the mother.

"Yes, but he never did so before.—All last winter he never said a word when I put my cold feet to his back, and now I know he doesn't love me;' and then the poor girl's tears broke out afresh.

Before the mother left, she managed to convince her daughter that all the world was hollow, and that the hollow of a man's back was not the place for his wife's cold feet.—Ex.

AT LAST.

The blessed information comes to us that at last the festive potato bug has found a common enemy that is destined to sweep it from the face of the earth. It comes in the shape of a parasite, which covers the bug so completely that the point of a needle could not be placed on any part of the beetle's body without touching one of the parasites There were 800 on one bug and it killed him. He was bull-dozed and counted out. Yet we can't part with this succulent fruit without a sigh at the many times we have seen him flip into a tin bucket, or climb the fence to lay out a summer campaign. Vale, potato bug.

Little by Little.

If you are gaining little by little, every day be content. Are your expenses less than your income, so that, though it be little, you are yet constantly accumulating and growing richer every day? Be content; so far as concerns money, you are doing well.

Are you gaining knowledge every day? Though it be little by little, the aggregate of the accumulations, where no day is permitted to pass without adding something to the stock, will be surprising to yourself.

Solomon did not become the wisest man in the world in a minute. Little by little—never omitting to learn something, even for a single day—always reading, always studying a little between the time of rising up in the morning and lying down at night; this is the way to accumulate a full storehouse of knowledge.

Finally, are you daily improving in character? Be not discouraged because it is little by little. The best men fall far short of what they themselves would wish to be. It is something, it is much, if you keep good resolutions better to-day than you did yesterday, this week than you did last, better this year than you did last year. Strive to be perfect, but do not be downheartened so long as you are approaching nearer and nearer to the high standard at which you aim.

Little by little, fortunes are accumulated; little by little, knowledge is gained; little by little, character and reputation are achieved.

In a ruling, at Goshen, last week, Judge Woods held that if a man rents a farm for a share of the grain raised by a tenant, all of the straw belongs to the tenant, unless a different contract was made by the parties.—Lagrange Standard.

Most ordinary common sense people have heretofore thought that when a man rents land on shares the tenant has only a legal right to his share of the products of the land in consideration of raising and turning over to the owner of the land a certain share of the products the tenant raises for the use of the soil. But it appears from this ruling when a man rents land for one-third, one half or two thirds of the crop, it means that he shall have all he raises except a share of the grain! We believe that when a tenant cultivates ground on the shares, whatever share it my be, the owner of the soil is as much entitled to his full share of all the products of the soil as the tenant, unless otherwise stipulated in the the contract. But as long as we have such rulings in our courts it would be well for all parties to leave nothing to chance.—Goshen Democrat.
